LEACH C. J. AND VARADACHARIAR J.

S. Meera Sahib & Bros.—Appellants.

Hajee M. Abdul Azeez Sahib and another—Respondents.

Appeals Nos. 20 and 29 of 1937, Decided on 19th August 1937, against judgment of Gentle J., D/- 7th December 1936.

 (a) Trade Mark—Infringement—Relief—In a passing off action, relief can only be granted on ground of defendant's doing something calculated to deceive—Essentials to be shown in such action stated.

In India there are no statutory enactments of the nature of the Trade Mark Acts which have been passed in England, and relief here can only be granted on the ground that the defendant has done something which is calculated to deceive. It is essential in a passing off action to show that there has been a false representation. It is not enough for a plaintiff to claim that he has adopted a device as a trade mark and that the defendant has copied this device or used one so like it that deception is probable. The plaintiff must show that he has used the mark claimed by him in his goods or in connexion with them and that the mark has become associated in the minds of the public with his goods. There must be user of the mark, because without user no reputation can be acquired. [P 2 C 2]

 (b) Trade Mark—Infringement—Right of action—Merchant is entitled to protection for trade mark if it is associated in market with goods he sells—It is immaterial whether goods are made for him in his country or abroad—Supplier's acquiring reputation in other country does not affect such merchant—It is not necessary that purchaser must know actual name of owner of goods.

A merchant who sells particular goods under particular trade mark is entitled to protection for that mark if he can show that it is associated in the market with the goods which he sells, because the law will not permit a person to pass off his goods for those of another. This is the governing principle and it matters not whether the merchant has goods made for him abroad or whether he has them made for him within the country. If a merchant establishes his reputation in connexion with a particular mark, the fact that the suppliers of the goods have also acquired a reputation in connexion with it in another country does not affect him. It is not necessary that the ultimate purchaser must know the actual name of the owner of the goods. It is sufficient if the ultimate purchaser knows that the goods bearing a particular mark have a reputation and that this mark denotes the goods he wishes to buy : Case law referred. [P 3 C 1, 2; P 4 C 1]

Leach C. J. — This appeal and Appeal No. 29 of 1937 arise out of a suit which was filed on the Original Side of this Court for an injunction in a passing off action and as they have been heard together they will be dealt with in one judgment. The appellant in this appeal was the defendant in the suit, and the appellant in Appeal No. 29 was plaintiff 1. The respondent in this appeal was plaintiff 2. It will be convenient to refer to them as plaintiff 1, plaintiff 2 and the defendant respectively. Plaintiff 2 is a piece-goods merchant carrying on business in Madras. For 12 years before the suit he had been in the habit of buying white twill from plaintiff 1, a company carrying on business in London. For the purposes of the case plaintiff 1 has been treated as the manufacturer of the goods, although he in fact did not make them. Having bought the twill from plaintiff 1 and imported it into Madras, plaintiff 2 sold it in the Madras Presidency where it has become well known as "diamond" twill. It is known as "diamond" twill because on it is stamped in gold the picture of a diamond with lines representing radiation from the diamond. Above the diamond is printed in gold the word "diamond", and below, the word "twill". The form of these letters is unusual. The mark was designed by plaintiff 1 and so far as business in England is concerned it has been accepted as belonging to plaintiff 1, but it is common ground that plaintiff 1 has never sold goods in India bearing this mark. His business has been confined to selling twill to plaintiff 2, who with the full consent of plaintiff 1 has sold it in India as his own "diamond" twill. In fact, the goods have been shipped by plaintiff 1 to plaintiff 2 with the mark stamped on them, and in a letter dated 12th July 1928 written by plaintiff 1 to plaintiff 2, plaintiff 1 said :

> We have already assured you that we would not under any conditions supply other dealers with twill stamped with your trade mark.

The words "your trade mark" refer to the diamond mark. In the plaint however it was claimed that the plaintiffs were jointly entitled to the exclusive use of the mark and an injunction was asked for on this basis. The defendant is also a Madras piece-goods merchant doing business throughout the Presidency. He like plaintiff 2 imports twills and other classes of piece-goods for sale here. From 1933 to 1935 he was importing twill under a mark which he called the "gold-star" mark. It consisted of a five pointed star with another star in the centre of it. Around this central star were ten other smaller stars. From the star were thin lines intended to represent radiation. Above the star were the words "gold-star" and underneath the word "twill". The lettering was of an entirely different character to the lettering of the mark used by plaintiff 2. In 1935 the defendant changed his mark in the following respects : (i) he altered the form of the letters to the very distinctive form used by plaintiff 2; (ii) he filled in the body of the star which had the effect of changing its appearance considerably and made it more in conformity with the plaintiff's diamond; and (iii) he changed the thin lines representing rays of light to thicker ones and thus made them more like the lines in the diamond mark. It is this new mark which the plaintiffs allege constitutes a colourable imitation of the diamond mark and in respect of which they seek the injunction.

The case was tried by Gentle J. who held that the defendant had deliberately changed his mark for the purpose of making it look like the diamond mark and that in its altered form it constituted a colourable imitation of that mark. After discussing the evidence, the learned trial Judge rejected the contention that the plaintiffs were the joint owners of the mark, but held that plaintiff 2 was entitled to an injunction on the ground that the mark had become associated in the public mind with the goods sold by him. Accordingly he dismissed plaintiff 1 from the suit, but granted an injunction to plaintiff 2 with costs. He also awarded him a sum of Rs. 500 by way of damages. The defendant has appealed against the decree passed against him, and plaintiff 1 has appealed against the order embodied in it dismissing him from the suit.

I will first deal with the appeal against the dismissal of plaintiff 1 from the suit. In India there are no statutory enactments of the nature of the Trade-mark Acts which have been passed in England and relief here can only be granted on the ground that the defendant has done something which is calculated to deceive. It is essential in a passing off action to show that there has been a false representation. It is not enough for a plaintiff to claim that he has adopted a device as a trade-mark and that the defendant has copied this device or used one so like it that deception is probable. The plaintiff must show that he has used the mark claimed by him on his goods or in connexion with them, and that the mark has become associated in the minds of the public with his goods. There must be user of the mark because without user no reputation can be acquired. In this case the evidence does not show any reputation in plaintiff 1 so far as India is concerned and this finding is sufficient to dispose of plaintiff 1's appeal. It will be necessary to return to the question of user when discussing the position of plaintiff 2, but plaintiff 1 having clearly failed to establish a cause of action against the defendant his appeal must be dismissed. I might add that in the course of his arguments the learned advocate for plaintiff 1 pointed out that it was not necessary for the plaintiffs, in view of the attitude of the defendants, to lay any stress in the trial Court on the plea of joint ownership. The defendant there conceded that either plaintiff 1 or plaintiff 2 or both of them together had the exclusive right to the use of the diamond mark in India. We appreciate this, and it is our intention merely to deal with the case so far as it affects the defendant and to say as little as possible with regard to the rights of the plaintiffs inter se.

Turning now to the defendant's appeal, I have no doubt that the defendant deliberately changed his mark in 1935 in order to make it resemble the mark used by plaintiff 2 and that he did this with the object of acquiring part of plaintiff 2's trade. I am further of the opinion that the alteration was of such character as to make it likely that the mark would be mistaken for the diamond mark. We have here a deliberate intention to defraud. The learned advocate for the defendant however contends that plaintiff 2 is not entitled to the injunction granted to him for two reasons. In the first place he says that plaintiff 2 is not the maker of the goods, but merely an importer and therefore he must show that the mark has become associated with his name in some special way as the importer of the goods and not merely as the seller. In the second place he says that before plaintiff 2 can obtain relief he must also show that the ultimate purchaser associates the mark with his name. He maintains that these conditions have not been fulfilled in this case.

On the first point the learned advocate for the defendant has cited many cases, but a detailed discussion of them is not called for. His argument is really based on a passage in the judgment of the Privy Council in (1924) A C 755[1] where it was pointed out that an importer might get a valuable reputation for himself and his wares by his care in selection or his precautions as to transit and storage or because his local character is such that the article acquires a value by his testimony to its genuineness, and if therefore goods though of the same make are passed off by competitors as being imported by him, he will have a right of action. But this statement does not pretend to be exhaustive and to declare all the circumstances in which an importer may acquire the right to the exclusive use of a trade-mark. A merchant who sells particular goods under a particular trade-mark is entitled to protection for that mark if he can show that it is associated in the market with the goods which he sells, because the law will not permit a person to pass off his goods for those of another. This is the governing principle and it matters not whether the merchant has goods made for him abroad or whether he has them made for him within the country. A decision of the Privy Council which has a direct bearing on this case is that in (1908) A C 443.[2] The plaintiffs there were manufacturers of watches in Switzerland and had acquired the business and trade-marks of another Swiss firm of watch manufacturers. The firm from which the plaintiffs had acquired these trade-marks had been in the habit of supplying watches to a customer carrying on business at Hong Kong who sold them under the manufacturers' trade-marks. The plaintiffs instituted a passing off action in Hong Kong against another dealer there on the ground that he was infringing the rights which they had acquired. Their Lordships held that the trade in Hong Kong belonged to the original importer and that the plaintiffs had not sufficient interest to found a cause of action. The same principle was applied by this Court in 24 Mad 163[3] and by the Bombay High Court in 35 Bom 425.[4]

In this case the evidence does establish the fact that the diamond mark is associated with the twill sold by the second plaintiff and having established his reputation in connection with this mark the fact that the suppliers of the goods have also acquired a reputation in connection with it in another country does not affect him. The manufacturer has never used the mark in India, and it was open to the second plaintiff to adopt it for his business in India, which as I have already pointed out he did with the full consent of the manufacturer. The defendant has altered his mark for the purpose of gaining for himself part of the business which his rival has built up and in view of the probability of deception the second plaintiff has a cause of action. The contention of the defendant that the second plaintiff must show that the ultimate purchaser associates this mark with his name is also fallacious. A reputation must be established, but that does not mean that the ultimate purchaser must know the actual name of the owner of the goods. In this connection I will refer to certain passages in the judgments in (1897) A C 710,[5] which is the well-known "Yorkshire Relish" case. Lord Halsbury observed (page 713) :

> It may be true that the customer does not know or care who the manufacturer is, but it is a particular manufacture that he desires. He wants "Yorkshire Relish" to which he has been accustomed, and which it is not denied has been made exclusively by the plaintiff for a great number of years. This thing which is put into the hands of the intended customer is not "Yorkshire Relish" in that sense. It is not the original manufacture. It is not made by the person who invented it. Under these circumstances it is a fraud upon the person who purchases to give him the one thing in place of the other.

In the same way it would be a fraud to place in the hands of a customer who wanted diamond twill, twill bearing the mark of the defendant. In the course of his judgment Lord Herschell said (p. 715) :

> In the present case it seems to me that "Yorkshire Relish" meant the manufacture of a particular person. I do not mean that in the minds of the public the name of the manufacturer was indentified, but that it meant a particular manufacture, and that when a person sold "Yorkshire Relish" as the defendants did, by selling it as "Yorkshire Relish" and calling it "Yorkshire Relish" they represented to the public that it was that manufacture which was known as and by the name of "Yorkshire Relish".

In 41 Bom 49[6] Scott C. J. held that where goods have acquired by a particular fancy description, combination or device, a reputation in the market, it is immaterial that the customers do not know who the maker is, and relied on the remarks of Lord Halsbury in the "Yorkshire Relish" case[5] and similar remarks of Lord Hatherley in (1872) 5 H L 508.[7] It is, therefore, quite clear that plaintiff 2 has not got to show that the ultimate purchaser knows his name and associates his name with the diamond mark. It is sufficient if the ultimate purchaser knows that goods bearing this mark have a reputation and that this mark denotes the goods which he wishes to buy. We do not regard the damages awarded as excessive and the only further question requiring consideration is the form of injunction. The learned trial Judge has issued an injunction prohibiting the use of the offending mark on all classes of piece-goods. It has been said on behalf of the defendant that this is too wide. In their plaint, the plaintiffs asked for an injunction in respect of all classes of piece-goods and in the trial Court it was not contended by the defendant that an injunction of this nature would be too wide if the plaintiffs succeeded in establishing their rights to the diamond mark. It was in fact taken for granted that they would be entitled to an injunction in this form if the right to exclusive user was proved. Plaintiff 2 and the defendant deal in the same kind of piece goods and the diamond mark has become associated in the trade with plaintiff 2. In these circumstances we see no reason to alter the form of the injunction. Both the appeals are accordingly dismissed. In Appeal No. 20, plaintiff 2 will be entitled to costs against the defendant, but the defendant will be entitled to costs in Appeal No. 29, as he has been successful there.

Varadachariar J.—I agree. I wish to add a few words with reference to the decision in 43 M L W 210,[8] as the learned counsel for the appellant relied on some observations of mine there as supporting his contention that the plaintiff in a "passing off" action must show that the persons purchasing the goods knew of the manufacturer or merchant by name and associated such name with the goods. That this is not the law is shown by the observations quoted by my Lord from the "Yorkshire Relish" case (1897) A C 710.[5] To the same effect there are also statements in (1911) A C 693[9] at pp. 702 and 705, and (1910) 1 Ch 257.[10] See also 50 Bom 402[11] at p. 412. of Lord Herschell in the "Yorkshire Relish" case[5] have been referred to in my judgment in 43 M L W 210,[8] it will not be a fair interpretation of that judgment to suggest that there is anything in it to support the appellant's present contention. The point I had then to determine was whether the plaintiff has shown a right to sue at all. He had certainly to establish some connection, in a sense known to law, such as manufacturer, seller, importer etc., between himself and the article which was alleged to have obtained a reputation. On the evidence in that case it appeared that it was his brother that had been manufacturing and selling the goods but the plaintiff did not claim in his brother's right. There was very little evidence as to what happened after the brother's death. It was on those facts that after making a quotation from 33 Mad 402,[12] I observed that there was no evidence to establish any such association in the public mind between the plaintiff's business and the goods bearing the mark in question.

LEACH C. J. AND VARADACHARIAR J.

K. A. Dawood Sahib — Appellant.

v.

V. A. Sheik Mohideen Sahib and another — Respondents.

Appeal No. 3 of 1937, Decided on 3rd August 1937, from judgment of Gentle J., D/- 12th October 1936.

Partnership Act (1932), Ss. 13 and 17—Agreement between two partners of firm as to share of profits and losses — Death of one partner and substitution of son in his place —No new agreement between them as to share in profits and losses—Son held entitled to share on same basis as his father under S. 17—S. 13 held inapplicable.

In an established firm of two partners it was agreed between them that one was to have 9½ annas share and the other was to have 6½ annas share. After the death of the former, his son stepped in and continued the partnership on the same lines as before. There was no agreement between the son and the surviving partner as to the share of each in the profits and losses of the newly constituted firm :

Held* that only a change had occurred in the constitution of the firm and under S. 17 of the Act the rights and duties of the partners in the re-constituted firm remained unchanged. The son of the former partner was therefore entitled, like his father into whose shoes he had stepped, to the 9½ annas share of the profits. S. 13 did not apply as it governed only cases where a new partnership was formed, and there was no agreement between the parties as to the share of each partner in the profits and losses sustained by the partnership firm. [P 6 C 1, 2]

W. V. Rangaswamy Iyengar — for Appellant.

C. Srinivasachari and V. S. Arunachelam — for Respondents.

Leach C. J.—This appeal arises out of a suit filed by respondent 1 on the Original Side of this Court. The appellant was defendant 1. The suit was for the taking of the accounts of a partnership between the plaintiff and defendant 1. It appears that the father of the plaintiff and defendant 1 entered into partnership on 14th April 1920. On 10th April 1931 the plaintiff's father died, which meant in law the dissolution of the partnership. The partnership business was however carried on by the plaintiff (who took the place of his deceased father) and defendant 1. This partnership carried on business until 1933 when defendant 1 gave notice to the plaintiff dissolving the partnership. When the original partnership was formed, that is the partnership between the plaintiff's father and defendant 1, it was agreed that they should share equally in the profits. They had each contributed a sum of Rs. 250 towards the capital. The plaintiff's father however was not satisfied with a division of profits on this basis, and on 16th November 1922 it was agreed between the plaintiff's father and defendant 1 that the plaintiff's father should be deemed to have a share of 9½ annas and defendant 1 a share of 6½ annas. This of course meant sharing both the losses and profits in these proportions. At an early stage in the original partnership, partnership moneys were advanced on mortgage. Two sums were in fact so advanced on the same property —a sum of Rs. 2,500 and another of Rs. 1,900. The mortgagors were unable to redeem the mortgages and were eventually compelled to convey the mortgaged property to the two partners in consideration of the mortgage debt plus a small monetary payment. The learned trial Judge gave the decree asked for and held that the profits and losses should be shared between the plaintiff and defendant 1 on the basis of 9½ annas and 6½ annas respectively and that they were entitled to share in these proportions the property which they had bought. The appeal is concerned with these findings.

The appellant says that in regard to the business subsequent to April 1931, the account should be taken on the basis that the parties were entitled to share equally in the partnership profits and that the house property also should be divided on this basis. The learned advocate for the appellant rightly abandoned the contention with regard to the house on having his attention drawn to the provisions of S. 48, Partnership Act, and therefore it is only necessary to discuss whether he is entitled to succeed on the other point. In the trial Court, the plaintiff contended that he was entitled to have the accounts taken on the basis that he had a share of 9½ annas on the ground that this had been expressly agreed. Defendant 1 similarly set up an express agreement to share equally. The learned Judge disbelieved the evidence of both the plaintiff and defendant 1 and held that there was no express agreement at all. The parties had merely agreed to carry on the partnership business, the plaintiff taking the place of his deceased father and nothing being said about the shares. On this finding he held that the plaintiff was entitled to the share of his deceased father, and we consider that this decision is correct. The learned advocate for the appellant has relied on the provisions of S. 13, Partnership Act. Cl. (b) of that section states that the partners are entitled to share equally in the profits earned, and shall contribute equally to the losses sustained by the firm. But the provisions in this section are all governed by the opening words of the section which are: "subject to contract between the partners". If there was no agreement between the parties and a new partnership was formed, the partnership would be governed by this section. But here we are dealing with a case where an established partnership business was continued on the same lines as before, after one of the partners had died, and S. 17 has application. That sections says :

Subject to contract between the partners : (a) where a change occurs in the constitution of a firm, the mutual rights and duties of the partners in the reconstituted firm remain the same as they were immediately before the change, as far as may be; (b) where a firm constituted for a fixed term continues to carry on business after the expiry of that term, the mutual rights and duties of the partners remain the same as they were before the expiry, so far as they may be consistent with the incidents of partnership at will; (c) where a firm constituted to carry out one or more adventures or undertakings carries out other adventures or undertakings, the mutual rights and duties of the partners in respect of the other adventures or undertakings are the same as those in respect of the original adventures or undertakings.

There was no special contract between the parties when the plaintiff and defendant 1 decided to continue the old business, but a change had occurred in the constitution of the firm. In these circumstances the Act contemplates that the rights and duties of the partners in the reconstituted firm shall remain unchanged. There is no doubt that from 1922 up to the time of his death the plaintiff's father was entitled to a share of 9½ annas, and we consider that in the circumstances of this case his son is entitled to a division on the same basis. The appeal will therefore be dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 736 of 1933, Decided on 27th April 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Masulipatam, in A. S. No. 19 of 1931.

 Hindu Law—Gift—Gift by Hindu father to daughter on marriage—Daughter dying issueless and husband claiming estate—Considerations to be borne in mind in construing such gift—It is not illegal to make gift carrying absolute estate in one contingency but cutting it down to life estate in other contingencies.

The quantum of estate given under a document has to be determined on a construction of the whole document and not merely on the words used in a portion thereof. [P 7 C 1]

In interpreting a gift by a Hindu father to his daughter, two considerations have to be borne in mind : (1) that he ordinarily desires that that property should devolve only on the children born to her and not upon other heirs in her husband's family and (2) that such a parent making a gift to his daughter soon after her marriage thinks it inauspicious to refer in terms to her death without issue and often employs circumlocutory language to indicate that contingency. It is not illegal to make a gift which in one contingency will carry an absolute estate, but (as the result of a gift over clause or of a cessor clause) be cut down in effect to a life-interest in other contingencies. [P 7 C 1, 2]

A father gifted certain property to his daughter on her marriage. The deed contained three clauses relating to heritability, power of disposition and the exclusion of particular heirs, making exception against the passing of the estate to other heirs than the donee's descendants. On the death of the daughter issueless, her husband claimed the estate contending that the condition as to heirs was repugnant to the absolute estate already conferred or amounted to a defeasance on an indefinite failure of the issue :

Held that on reading the document as a whole the three clauses related to the period of the daughter's ownership of the gifted property and not as involving a condition or limitation intended to be indefinitely imposed, and it did not contain a provision for a cessation or defeasance of her interest on an indefinite failure of issue. The deed therefore did not convey an absolute estate to the daughter so as to devolve on her husband by inheritance on her death without issue : 4 Cal 23 (P C), Rel. on. [P 7 C 2]

Judgment.—The decision of this second appeal turns on the interpretation of Ex. B (dated 22nd April 1922), a deed of gift executed in favour of the plaintiff's deceased wife by her father. The donee died without issue within a couple of years after Ex. B and that led to disputes between the plaintiff and his father-in-law. There are some portions of the document which are not very aptly worded, but, taking the document as a whole, I feel no serious doubt as to the intention of the donor. In interpreting the document, two considerations have to be borne in mind : (1) that a Hindu father making a gift to his daughter ordinarily desires that that property should devolve only on the children born to her and not upon other heirs in her husband's family and (2) that such a parent making a gift to his daughter soon after her marriage thinks it inauspicious to refer in terms to her death without issue and often employs circumlocutory language to indicate that contingency. That portions of Ex. B if read by themselves will amount to the creation of an absolute interest in the donee, there can be no doubt. But the quantum of estate given under a document has to be determined on a construction of the whole document and not merely on the words used in a portion thereof; and decisions beginning with 4 Cal 23[1] recognize that as a matter of law it is possible to make a gift which in one contingency will carry an absolute estate but (as the result of a gift over clause or of a cessor clause) be cut down in effect to a life-interest in other contingencies. Bearing these considerations in mind, it seems to me that the Courts below have put a right construction upon Ex. B in holding that in the events that have happened the plaintiff's wife did not have an absolute estate which could devolve by inheritance on her husband.

On behalf of the appellants, Mr. Lakshmayya contended that the later portions in Ex. B which make an exception against the passing of the estate to other heirs than the donee's descendants must either be regarded as a condition repugnant to the absolute estate already conferred or as amounting to a defeasance on an indefinite failure of issue. If the clause is read in either of the above senses, it will of course be inoperative. But having carefully considered the frame of the document, it seems to me that the object of the exclusion of other heirs is not an attempt to lay down a different rule of succession from the ordinary law in respect of the devolution of an absolute estate, but an attempt to indicate that the lady should take a heritable estate only if she had descendants of her own body to inherit the estate. The three clauses which respectively relate to heritability, power of disposition and the exclusion of particular heirs are all worded as qualifications to the gift in favour of the daughter and all the three may reasonably be read in the context as relating to the period of her ownership and not as involving a condition or limitation intended to be indefinitely imposed. There is thus no reason to read the document as providing for a cessation or defeasance of her interest on an indefinite failure of issue. The authorities relied on by Mr. Lakshmayya emphasize this very distinction, namely between cases where cessation or defeasance of the grantee's interest is to take place on events happening at the death of the grantee and cases where it is to happen on an indefinite contingency. I accordingly agree with the decision of the Courts below and dismiss the second appeal with costs. (Leave refused.)

Appeal No. 112 of 1931 and Second Appeal No. 1214 of 1932, Decided on 19th March 1937.

(a) Benami — Wife having separate income of her own though its amount uncertain — Purchase of properties in her name — Mere impossibility to connect any of sale deeds with particular item of her asset is no inference that purchase is by husband with family fund — Even if money has been contributed by husband, it is no conclusive proof of benami character of purchase.

Where a wife has a separate income of her own, though the amount thereof is not known, and certain properties are purchased in her name, the mere fact that it is found impossible to connect any of the sale deeds relating to the properties with a particular item of asset belonging to the wife does not necessarily lead to the inference that the purchases have been made with the family funds by the husband. The mere suspicion that the purchases might not have wholly been made with the lady's money will certainly not suffice to establish that the purchases were benami, nor even the suspicion that moneys belonging to the husband, whether in a smaller measure or a larger measure, must have also contributed to these purchases. Even in cases where there is positive evidence that money had been contributed by the husband and not by the wife, that circumstance is not conclusive in favour of the benami character of the transaction, though it is an important criterion. It is true that in the Indian law, the English rule as to presumption of advancement has not been adopted, but S. 82, Trusts Act, recognizes that money may have been contributed by another towards a purchase with the intention of giving a beneficial interest to the person in whose name the purchase is made. The relationship of husband and wife between the person who contributes the money and the person in whose name the sale is taken will be a very important factor in determining whether the transaction was really meant for the benefit of the wife or not. Where the motive alleged for a benami transaction itself suggests that the purpose in view could be served only by a genuine transfer and not by a mere benami transaction, the more reasonable inference is that the transfer was intended to be operative as a transfer of beneficial interest and not as a mere benami transaction. [P 10 C 2 ; P 11 C 1]

(b) Benami — Onus.

The onus lies upon the person who pleads that certain transaction executed and registered in the name of a person is benami. [P 10 C 2]

(c) Limitation Act (1908), Arts. 142 and 144 — Certain property in possession of tenants — Attempts by rival claimants to property to get tenants to attorn to one side or other — Suit by one for possession — Art. 144 and not Art. 142 applies.

A certain property was in the possession of the tenants. In a dispute between two rival claimants to the title of the property, each claimant made attempts to get the tenants to attorn to the one side or to the other. Subsequently one of the claimants sued the other for possession of the property :

Held that in circumstances of such kind the principle of Art. 144 and not Art. 142 should be applied. [P 11 C 2]

JUDGMENT

Second Appeal No. 1214 of 1932 — This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of possession of 15 items of properties on the ground that the plaintiff has become entitled thereto under a gift deed (Ex. A) executed in his favour by one Seetha Bai Ammal on 4th September 1914. Seetha Bai Ammal was the widow of one Jagannadha Rao and the mother-in-law of defendant 1. As defendant 1 is also called Seetha Bai Ammal, we will refer to defendant 1 when necessary as the daughter-in-law. Jagannadha Rao died some time in 1903 leaving him surviving his widow Seetha Bai Ammal and an adopted son Subba Rao who died in May 1914. The evidence shows that during the last days of Subba Rao or soon after his death the relations between the mother-in-law and the daughter-in-law became strained and the plaintiff who is the grandson of a brother of the mother-in-law and who had been living in Subba Rao's family for some years, managed to persuade the old lady to execute a gift in his favour of properties in respect of which the title stood in her name. The old lady died a few months after the date of the gift ; and for several years thereafter, the plaintiff on the one hand and defendant 1 on the other have been endeavouring to secure the tenants in possession of these properties to their respective sides till ultimately the plaintiff instituted this suit just when the period of 12 years from the date of the gift deed was about to expire.

The plaintiff claimed that the properties in respect of which the title deeds stood in the donor's name were her stridhanam properties and that she was accordingly competent to make a gift thereof. Defendant 1 who was the contesting defendant pleaded that though the title to these properties stood in Seetha Bai Ammal's name, they had all been purchased with the funds belonging to Jagannadha Rao, benami in her name. A plea of limitation was also raised. The question of benami formed the subject of issue 1 and the question of limitation of issue 2. The learned Subordinate Judge found issue 1 in plaintiff's favour; on issue 2 he found that as regards five items, namely items 1 to 3, 13 and 15, the plaintiff had not shown that he or his donor had been in possession within 12 years of the institution of the suit, but that in respect of the other items the plaintiff's possession within the statutory period had been proved. He accordingly dismissed the suit so far as it related to items 1 to 3, 13 and 15 and gave a decree in the plaintiffs favour in respect of the other items. Defendant 1 has filed this appeal against so much of the decree as is against her and the plaintiff has filed a memorandum of objections in respect of the items disallowed to him.

In dealing with the question of benami, we may mention at the outset that it has not been suggested that Jagannadha Rao had any creditor from whom he desired to screen these properties. It is obvious from the written statement that defendant 1 was hard put to it to suggest a motive for a benami transaction. It is true that Jagannadha Rao took defendant 1's husband in adoption in 1884 and some of the letters exhibited in the case show that as a young boy he was not easily persuaded to come and live with his adoptive parents and preferred to go back to the place where he had theretofore been living. These letters relate to a period when defendant 1's husband was eight or nine years old and it would be too much to suggest that at that time such conduct brought about any differences between Jagannadha Rao and the adopted son with reference to which the necessity for resorting to benami transactions could be explained. In para. 3 of the written statement it is stated that Jagannadha Rao took such precautions as he liked in order to avoid among other things the possibility of the adopted son quarrelling with him and squandering the properties and in order to ensure the obedient conduct of the adopted son to his dictates and to avoid the possibility of the members of his natural family instigating the adopted son to act adversely to the interests of the adoptive father. In the course of the evidence one or two further reasons have been suggested, such as a desire on Jagannadha Rao's part to keep apart some properties for the benefit of any aurasa son that he still expected might be born to him or a desire to ensure that the adopted son would behave respectfully towards Sita Bai Amma by making it appear that she was the owner of some properties. We find it hard to believe that any of these motives would have led to a benami transaction rather than to a real transaction in favour of the wife.

The principle argument of Mr. Govindarajachari before us on behalf of the appellant was that as the attempt on the plaintiff's side to establish that these properties were acquired with the lady's funds had failed, it must be held that they were purchased by Jagannadha Rao with funds belonging to the joint family of himself and his adopted son, and that as sufficient provision for her maintenance had been made by Ex. B and also by the provision in the adoption deed itself in the possible contingency of differences between her and the adopted son, there was nothing to rebut the presumption arising under the law that the purchases made in the wife's name with family funds were only made for the benefit of the family. It seems to us that this argument puts the effect of the evidence much too high, and that the legal implications therein contained are not altogether tenable. It appears from the documentary evidence, as well as from the admissions made by defendant 1 herself and by D. W. 13, that Seetha Bai Ammal did have some moneys of her own and some money-lending transactions of her own. It is, however, not possible to fix the amount that she was thus in possession of. The evidence also establishes that at least after 1886 she must have been entitled to an annual income of between Rs. 100 and Rs. 200 from the properties set apart for her under Ex. B, while the collection of that income was being made by Jagannadha Rao himself. In such circumstances the mere fact that the plaintiff or his witnesses do not now find it possible to connect any of the sale deeds relating to the suit properties with a particular item of asset belonging to the lady does not necessarily lead to the inference that the purchases should have been made with family funds by Jagannadha Rao. Some of the transactions under which the suit properties were acquired were for comparatively small prices. The only substantial acquisition was under Ex. D in 1896, the consideration therefor being made up of the amount which accrued due on a usufructuary mortgage of 1887 for a sum of Rs. 2,250 and a cash payment of Rs. 700.

In the light of the circumstances stated above, there is nothing that necessarily suggests that the Rs. 700 paid in cash at the time of Ex. D must have been Jagannadha Rao's money and could not have been the lady's. As regards the Rs. 2,250 advanced on the usufructuary mortgage in 1887, we have no evidence suggesting whether it could have been the lady's money or Jagannadha Rao's money. The position therefore at best only comes to this: here is a lady, the wife of a comparatively well-to-do man with an income of more than Rs. 1,500 per annum, the lady herself having some means of her own, though the amount thereof is not known. The husband had no intelligible motive for entering into any benami transaction. He gets documents executed in her name with a distinct statement that the moneys paid for the purchases constituted the stridhanam property of the lady. In relation to the properties thus acquired, he takes registered lease deeds in the lady's name and also gets a power of attorney executed by that lady appointing her own agent to attend to her affairs. It does not appear that during all the time that Jagannadha Rao was alive, he ever took a single lease deed in his name in respect of these properties, except as regards one house which was leased to the Postal Department. There is no doubt evidence that the realization of the income from these properties was attended to by Jagannadha Rao or his men, but that would have been equally the case even if these properties belonged to the lady and not to Jagannadha Rao. It is admitted that in respect of a mortgage under which money was due to this lady long prior to the adoption and in respect of the properties settled on this lady by Ex. E, the interest or income used to be realized by Jagannadha Rao or his men.

It is clear from the adoption deed and from Ex. B that Jagannadha Rao was alive to the possibility of the relations between his wife and the adopted son turning out to be unfriendly, and it is nothing strange if in those circumstances a man in that position desired to put the lady in a position of some independence without depending upon the adopted son or being obliged to sue him for maintenance or for a share in terms of Ex. I. It is also significant that even during the period when he was taking sale deeds in his wife's name in respect of the suit properties, he was entering into other transactions of sale and mortgage in his own name, thus showing that he had no reason at that time to make it appear that he had no properties of his own other than the ancestral properties. Having regard to these circumstances, we think the learned Subordinate Judge was justified in coming to the conclusion that the sale deeds relating to the suit properties were not taken in Seetha Bai Ammal's name benami for her husband or for the family. The onus lies in the first instance on the defendant who pleads that these transactions are benami. The mere suspicion that the purchases might not have wholly been made with the lady's money will certainly not suffice to establish that the purchases were benami, nor even the suspicion that moneys belonging to Jagannadha Rao, whether in a smaller measure or a larger measure, must have also contributed to these purchases. Even in cases where there is positive evidence that money had been contributed by the husband and not by the wife, that circumstance is not conclusive in favour of the benami character of the transaction though it is an important criterion. It is true that in the Indian law the English rule as to presumption of advancement has not been adopted, but S. 82, Trusts Act, as well as the observations of the Judicial Committee in 37 All 557[1] at pp. 564 and 565 recognize that money may have been contributed by another towards a purchase with the intention of giving a beneficial interest to the person in whose name the purchase is made. The relationship of husband and wife between the person who contributes the money and the person in whose name the sale is taken will be a very important factor in determining whether the transaction was really meant for the benefit of the wife or not.

The observations in 17 M L J 339[2] are not opposed to this view, because there was evidence in that case to suggest that the transfers were taken in the wife's name with a view to screen the property from creditors. In 4 M L W 193[3] and 67 M L J 541[4] reference has been made to the terms of S. 82, Trusts Act, and an attempt has been made to read the observations of the Judicial Committee in earlier cases consistently with the provisions of that section. The observations of their Lordships in 33 Cal 773[5] at p. 784, and of Venkatasubba Rao J. in 67 M L J 541[4] also show that where the motive alleged for a benami transaction itself suggests that the purpose in view could be served only by a genuine transfer and not by a mere benami transaction, the more reasonable inference is that the transfer was intended to be operative as a transfer of the beneficial interest and not as a mere benami transaction.

1. Mt. Bilas Kunwar v. Desraj Ranjit Singh, A I R 1915 P C 96=30 I C 299=42 I A 202=37 All 557 (P C).
2. Sanjivaroya Pillai v. Balambika Ammal, (1907) 17 M L J 339.

Mr. Govindarajachari next suggested that if and in so far as any moneys of Jagannadha Rao had gone to make the purchases of the suit property in his wife's name, a gift thereof would be invalid as a gift of joint family property. This question was not raised in the Court below in that form and the appellants' learned counsel explains it by pointing out that the plaintiffs' attempt in the lower Court was to establish that the purchases were made with the lady's funds and not with the family funds. Assuming that that contention can be raised at this stage, it will be material to consider it only if there is positive evidence that funds belonging to the joint family had been used for the purpose of these purchases. The mere fact that the plaintiff is not able to establish that the purchases were made with the lady's funds, will not entitle defendant 1 to ask the Court to take it for granted that joint family monies must have been utilized for these purchases. We accordingly confirm the finding of the lower Court on issue 1.

With reference to the plea of limitation, we are not satisfied that the lower Court was justified in dealing with the case as one governed by Art. 142, Lim. Act. The allegations in the plaint as well as the evidence tendered during the course of the trial establish that all the suit properties were in the possession of tenants. It is true that during Subba Rao's time he was taking muchilikas in his name and collecting the income from the suit properties. But as he and his adoptive mother were living together amicably, it cannot be seriously suggested that his possession or management was adverse to the mother's interest. As we have already said, the relations between the mother-in-law and the daughter-in-law became strained as soon as Subba Rao died and the plaintiff's interference with a view to securing some benefit to himself seems to have made matters worse. A scramble accordingly began after Subba Rao's death by the attempts made on each side to get the tenants to attorn to the one side or to the other. In circumstances of that kind, the principle of Art. 144 and not Art. 142 should be applied. Considering the evidence on this basis, the conclusion seems to us to be that in respect of most of the suit items, defendant 1 has failed to show that she got the tenants in possession to attorn to her more than 12 years before the institution of the suit. In many instances registered muchilikas have been taken from the tenants in the mother-in-law's name and there is evidence that some of these tenants were sued for rent on the basis of such muchilikas and decrees were obtained. As against such evidence on the plaintiff's side, the story related on the defendant's side of oral arrangements and payments of rent to her can scarcely be seriously pressed.

As regards one of the items of property, namely item 14, a house in Rajahmundry, a further point was pressed before us on behalf of the appellant, namely that only a part of the house was in the occupation of the tenant who had attorned to the mother-in-law and that the other part was in the possession of a lady named Pankajam who refused to attorn to the old lady. In the suit for rent instituted by the plaintiff against these two tenants, the suit was decreed only against the former and not against the latter. It was accordingly contended that at least to the extent of the interest in one-half of the house in the possession of Pankajam the plaintiff's suit should be held to be barred by limitation. But if, as we have already pointed out, the principle to be applied is that of Art. 144, it is not sufficient for the defendants merely to suggest that Pankajam had not attorned to the old lady or to the plaintiff. It is only on proof that she had attorned to defendant 1 that the plaintiff's suit could be held to be barred even as regards the portion in her possession. Defendant 1's evidence is only that sometime after 1915 Pankajam paid 10 months rent in respect of her portion to defendant 1. Even taking this to be true, that is within 12 years of the institution of the suit, we see no reason to differ from the conclusion of the lower Court in respect of items 4 to 10, 11, 12 and 14.

As regards the items disallowed to the plaintiff by the lower Court, we see no reason to interfere with its conclusion in respect of items 1, 13 and 15. But in respect of items 2 and 3, we are unable to agree with the lower Court's decision. These items were in the possession of one Chinnam Raju as a tenant under Subba Rao under a lease (Ex. 26) executed in 1911. Very soon after Subba Rao's death, the plaintiff succeeded in taking a lease in Seetha Bai Ammal's name, i. e. Ex. J.10 from one Bapiraju, a brother of Chinnam Raju. It is true that if the new lessee was a stranger and the former tenant in possession attorned to defendant 1, the Court may reasonably hesitate to believe that the new tenant got peaceful possession. It is apparently on this assumption that the learned Subordinate Judge observed in para. 26 of his judgment that it was difficult to believe that the old tenant gave up possession of these items to Bapiraju. But the evidence of D. W. 4 and Ex. 18 establish that Chinnam Raju, the former tenant, must have died in 1913 or early in 1914 and it appears from Ex. 18 itself that in February 1914 it was Bapiraju who sent the rent due in respect of these items to Subba Rao. We therefore see no reason to think that it was unlikely that Ex. J.10 represented a real transaction of lease or that Bapiraju would not have got into possession under it. The defendants' story that Chinnam Raju's widow Venkatammal was in possession and paid her rent, does not seem entitled to weight in the face of the registered lease executed by Bapiraju and the circumstances above adverted to. We would accordingly set aside the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge in respect of items 2 and 3 and give a decree to the plaintiff in respect of these items as well.

As regards item 15, it will follow from our finding on the question of benami that the title thereto also is in the plaintiff. But the learned Subordinate Judge has not given the plaintiff a decree in respect of that item because in the connected suit, O. S. No. 17 of 1929, he held that the present plaintiff had not shown that he had possession of this item within 12 years of the institution of the suit. Apart from the observation we have already made that in the circumstances of of the present case the principle of Art. 144 and not Art. 142 should be applied, the learned Judge's observation that the plaintiff was not in possession of this item within 12 years of the institution of the suit seems to rest upon a misapprehension, because D. W. 9, the tenant who is alleged to have been in possession of this item under defendant 1, admits that for at least a year after Subba Rao's death the plaintiff was occupying a portion of this house. We accordingly hold that the learned Judge's finding on the question of limitation even in respect of this item is not correct. But as his decision has been set aside on appeal by the District Court in A. S. 9/31, it is not necessary that we should pass a formal decree for possession in the present plaintiff's favour in respect of this item. It will be sufficient if there is a declaration of title in plaintiff's favour in respect of this item.

As regards items 2 and 3 which we have allowed in plaintiff's favour, the plaintiff will also be entitled to mesne profits from defendant 1 at a flat rate of Rs. 30 per annum for the three years before suit (1923-1925) and future mesne profits at the same rate from 1926 till delivery of possession of the suit items or until the expiry of three years from this date whichever happens earlier. We do not, however, think it necessary to interfere with the direction in the lower Court's decree as to costs. The appeal is dismissed with costs. In the memorandum of objections there will be no order as to costs as the parties succeed in part and fail in part. For the reasons given above, S. A. No. 1214 of 1932 is dismissed with costs.

Varadachariar J.— Before the decree in this appeal was finally drawn up, it was brought to our notice by the learned counsel for the appellants that in dealing with issue 4, the lower Court had omitted to give the appellants credit for payments made by them in respect of public charges like land revenue and cesses. The case was accordingly directed to be posted for being spoken to. The respondents' learned counsel points out that the course adopted by the lower Court in para. 35 of the judgment was to adopt the figures as to income shown by the lease deeds of a much earlier date though the income relating to the period in respect of which mesne profits were claimed by them prior and subsequent to suit would have been much greater, and that the Court, in order to avoid an inquiry, preferred to adopt the earlier figures on the understanding however that details of disbursements made by the defendants during the period of their possession need not be taken into account. The parties are not able to agree before us as to the precise basis on which the lower Court proceeded.

Theoretically, the plaintiff is entitled to an inquiry as to mesne profits in respect of the period to which the issue relates and the appellants are entitled to deduction in respect of public charges disbursed by them. Both parties would undoubtedly have saved considerable time and expense if they could have agreed on some figures. But in the absence of such agreement, we have no alternative but to set aside the finding of the Court below on issue 4 and send the case back to the lower Court for an inquiry in respect of mesne profits in the manner prescribed by law as regards items 4 to 12 and 14. The figures arrived at after such inquiry will be inserted by the lower Court in the place of the figure now entered in its decree. As regards the two other items which we allowed in the appeal, namely items 2 and 3, our judgment has already fixed the rate and this amount has only to be added to the figure which the lower Court may arrive at.

Second Appeal No. 702 of 1933, Decided on 5th May 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Berhampore, D/- 6th October 1932.

 Minor — Decree against — Grounds for setting aside such decree stated — Compromise decree against minor can also be set aside even if it is sanctioned by Court — Grounds for setting aside such compromise decree stated.

A decree suffered by a next friend or guardian ad litem of the minors in a suit can be set aside on their attaining majority on the ground of fraud, collusion or gross negligence of the next friend or guardian ad litem. What is gross negligence depends on the facts of each case, but it must be such negligence as would lead to the loss of a right which would have been successfully asserted if the suit had been conducted or resisted with due care. Failure of a guardian to do his duty in getting all the available material and placing it before the Court would amount to gross negligence on the part of the guardian. A decree by consent stands on the same footing as other decrees. A consent decree obtained with the sanction of Court cannot be set aside except upon very strong grounds, such grounds as amount to fraud in the party claiming the benefit of the compromise decree. [P 15 C 2; P 16 C 1]

An obligation is laid on both the parties to place all the materials in their possession where minors are concerned in order to enable the Court to judge the fairness of the compromise, and where a party seeking the benefit of the compromise against a minor has no honest belief in the claim he is making and the claim is absolutely without any foundation, the compromise will not be allowed to stand as the Court is not apprised of the real state of facts and the compromise sanctioned by the Court must be deemed to have passed on a misapprehension of material facts having been withheld by the party who had knowledge of the same. Such withholding will in law amount to fraud : Case law referred. [P 16 C 2]

Judgment.—This second appeal arises out of a suit brought by the two daughters of one Lingaraju Bytharu, a resident of Pandyajholi village, Berhampore taluk, Ganjam district, for a declaration that the compromise decree suffered by their grandmother Dimmala Mutyalu in O. S. No. 178 of 1921 on the file of the Court of the District Munsif of Berhampore is null and void and not binding on them. The ground alleged was that the properties, which were dealt with by the compromise decree, belonged to their father in his sole and absolute right, that they were devised by him before his death in favour of his daughters, the plaintiffs in this suit and another daughter since deceased, on certain terms mentioned in his last will and testament dated 12th August 1920, and that by reason of the gross negligence of their grandmother she was induced to enter into a compromise by Somanatha Bythari, the father of the defendants, and the paternal uncle of their father by reason whereof they lost a considerable portion of the property. The learned District Munsif upheld their plea and set aside the compromise decree. The learned Subordinate Judge reversed the decision of the learned District Munsif. He was of the opinion that as the compromise was certified by the counsel appearing for the plaintiffs in the prior litigation and sanctioned by the Court, it could not be set aside in view of the state of circumstances that existed at the time of the compromise. He further found that the father of the defendants was under no obligation to place before the Court any material opposite to the contention which he was advancing in the said suit. This second appeal has been preferred against the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge by plaintiff 2, plaintiff 1 being made a party to the appeal.

It is strenuously contended in appeal by Mr. Anantha Ayyar on behalf of the appellant that the learned Judge has not correctly appreciated the law bearing on the question as to how far the compromise decree suffered by the guardian of the minors can be set aside and that in arriving at the conclusion he did, he has omitted to consider several material facts which were admittedly beyond dispute. Before dealing with the contention, it is necessary to state exactly the circumstances and the facts that existed at the time the compromise was entered into. Lingaraju Bytharu, the father of the plaintiffs, was one of the four sons of one Jagannatho Bytharu, the other sons being Panchakshari, Gangadharo, the grandfather of the defendants and the father of Somanath Bytharu and Lokanatha Bytharu. Both Panchakshari and Lokanatha had no issue, male or female. Lokanatha appears to have died very early leaving his widow Mahalakshmi. It was found by the learned District Munsif that in or about 1890 there was a reference to arbitration as evidenced by Ex. J to divide the family properties and the parties thereto were Lingaraju, Panchakshari, Gangadharo and Mahalakshmi, widow of Lokanatha, and in pursuance thereof there was a division in and by which the family properties were divided in certain shares. This finding was not disturbed by the learned Subordinate Judge in appeal. Subsequent to the said date the brothers have been living separately and enjoying their properties and dealing with them separately. That the brothers were in enjoyment of their properties separately has been found by the learned District Munsif and this finding has not been challenged in second appeal. Further it could not be attacked in view of the undisputed documentary evidence in the case. So far as Lingaraju is concerned, he seems to have obtained about 1 acre odd lands and a house in Lati village.

Subsequent to the said partition, he appears to have purchased about 7 acres of land in the village of Satto Pandva in or about 1897 (Ex. P). All these properties were without any doubt admittedly enjoyed by Lingaraju; the pattas stood in his name, muchilikas were obtained from tenants in his name and even after his death the plaintiffs' grandmother successfully recovered rents from the tenants in spite of the opposition of Somanath whose title the tenant set up: vide Exs. H and H-1. The muchilikas are evidenced by Ex. Q series, the pattas are evidenced by Ex. R series and the cist receipts are evidenced by Ex. S series in the case. Shortly before his death, Lingaraju executed a registered will Ex. M wherein he asserted that the property was purely ancestral and self-acquired. This is true because part of his property, namely the house and lands in Lati village, is ancestral and part of the property, namely the lands in Sathopandya village, is self-acquired. He further stated that they were all then in his undisputed right and enjoyment. He devised the properties absolutely to his daughters to be taken by them in the manner provided for them in the said will. Thus, so far as Lingaraju is concerned, from 1890 up to the date of his death in 1920, his conduct was that of a divided member of the family enjoying the properties in his own right. So far as Panchakshari is concerned, he mortgaged in 1911 by Ex. D certain property which he got in the partition in favour of one Mallayya. The recital therein is very important. It runs thus:

> Whereas I have executed in your favour possessory mortgage deed in respect of the lands which are mentioned in para. 3 hereinbelow, and which having formed my ancestral acquisition and fallen to my share on partition, have till this day been in my rightful ownership, and put you in possession thereof. . . . .

Thus it will be seen that there was a distinct admission by Panchakshari of the partition and the acquisition of that property in partition and an assertion that the said property has been in his rightful ownership and possession on the date he was purporting to mortgage the said property. Three years thereafter by a document Ex. C dated 8th February 1914, he disposed of the said property absolutely in favour of Lingaraju Achari. So far as Somanath, the father of the defendants, is concerned, he seems to have dealt with the property which he got in the partition in 1915; by a document Ex. E dated 13th October 1915 he sold certain lands and a house in favour of his wife Bavuri Amma. The recital therein also is significant. It states:

> Whereas I have this.day sold to you for Rupees 1,000 . . . . . for the two items my ancestral immoveable property in land which is mentioned in para. 3 hereinbelow, and which till this day remains in my rightful ownership and enjoyment together with the occupancy right therein possessed by me and put you in possession thereof. . . . . .

That this was acted on is evidenced by the Settlement Register Ex. K from which it appears that the patta for the lands was transferred in favour of Bavuri Amma. Thus it will be seen that Somanath makes a distinct admission that the property which he disposed of was the ancestral acquisition and was in his rightful ownership and possession. This could only have been possible on the footing of a partition. From the proceedings in a later suit, O. S. No. 400 of 1922 on the file of the Court of the District Munsif of Berhampore and from the admission of Somanath Bythari in his written statement in O. S. No. 178 of 1921 (Ex. N), it appears that the family had two houses in Panyajoi; one appears to have fallen to the share of Mahalakshmi and the other to defendant 7 Somanath, which was disposed of under Ex. E. In Ex. E the southern boundary of the said house is described as the house belonging to Kasarapu Mahalakshmi. This seems to indicate that Mahalakshmi obtained a house. From Ex. K it appears that certain survey numbers which stood in the joint names of defendant 7 and Mahalakshmi were thereafter transferred in favour of Somanath's wife Bavuri Amma and in favour of Mahalakshmi.

Lingaraju, as I stated, died some time after the will. Somanath seems to have created trouble and trespassed the title to the lands and thereupon two suits were instituted, one being O. S. No. 178 of 1921 by plaintiff 2 represented by her grandmother Dimmala Mutyalu for a declaration that the suit house belonged to her under her father's will and that the property belonged to her father, and the other being O. S. No. 320 of 1921 by both the present plaintiffs represented by their grandmother, the said Dimmala Mutyala, seeking for a declaration of title to the lands devised under their father's will in their favour. The defence of Somanath was that the family was an undivided one, that there was no division, that the properties were separately being enjoyed for the sake of convenience and that he got the property by survivorship and that he was not aware of the will left by his brother and the dispositions therein were not binding on him. It was in this state of facts that the compromise was entered into as evidenced by Ex. T.1 dated 19th April 1922. Under the said compromise, the plaintiffs have completely lost the right to the house except the right of residence and in regard to the lands they have lost half the right therein, both with reference to the lands in Lathi village and Satyapandya village. There can be no question that the plaintiffs have suffered real detriment or loss by reason of this compromise if the property had belonged absolutely to their father. It may also be stated in this connexion that very soon after this compromise in respect of the property disposed of by Panchakshari, Somanath seems to have also trespassed on the suit property and in regard to that there was a suit filed by the vendee to which Somanath and the present plaintiffs were parties, the suit being O. S. No. 400 of 1922 on the file of the District Munsif of Berhampore, wherein it was found that there was a partition in the family in 1890 and ever since the brothers were in separate enjoyment and possession of the properties which fell to their shares and were dealing with them separately, and Somanath did not appeal against that decision.

In this state of facts, the question is whether the compromise entered into by the plaintiffs' grandmother can be sustained. It is not disputed that a decree suffered by a next friend or guardian ad litem of the minors in a suit can be set aside on their attaining majority on the ground of fraud, collusion or gross-negligence of the next friend or guardian ad litem. What is gross negligence will depend on the facts of each case, but it must be such negligence as would lead to the loss of a right which must have been successfully asserted if the suit had been conducted or resisted with due care : vide 6 C L J 621.[1] The omission to prosecute a claim (vide 3 W R 46[2]), to set up a valid plea (vide 27 M L J 486[3]), to offer evidence to support a plea (vide 67 M L J 27[4]), have been held in the circumstances of a particular case to amount to a gross negligence as would warrant giving relief to a minor by setting aside the decree. A decree by consent would, it seems to me, stand on the same footing as other decrees. But Mr. Lakshmanna contends otherwise. He strongly relies on the decisions in 28 Bom L R 362[5] and A I R 1929 Mad 96.[6] It seems to me that no such distinction can be drawn though a consent decree obtained with the sanction of the Court cannot be set aside except upon very very strong grounds as was pointed out by Turner, L. J. in (1865) 2 De G J & S 373=46 E R 419.[7] In that case, in discussing the circumstances which would furnish sufficient ground for impeaching such a decree, the Lord Justice observed thus :

> They must be such as to amount to fraud in the party claiming the benefit of the compromise, meaning by fraud not moral fraud, but what in the eye of this Court is considered as amounting to fraud. A compromise of doubtful rights between adult parties cannot, as I conceive, be set aside on any other ground. If there be no fraud, and equal knowledge on both sides, the compromise cannot be disturbed, but if there is knowledge on one side which is withheld, the compromise cannot stand, because the withholding of the knowledge amounts in the view of a Court of Equity to fraud. The rule which applies to adults seems to me to be not less applicable to compromises by the Court on behalf of infants.

Later on he observes as follows :

> If the compromise was fairly and honestly entered into at the time, its validity cannot, as I conceive, be affected by what subsequently occurred. The true question in this very complicated case seems to me to be, was this compromise fairly and honestly made at the time ? If it was, the plaintiff must be bound by it. If it was not, he must be entitled to be relieved against it.

In that case he set aside the compromise on the ground that a material document which would have influenced the Court and which was in the possession of the party who was seeking an order against the minor, had not been placed before the Court. In relation to that he observed :

> It is sufficient to say that in my opinion this document shows that the materials necessary to enable a fair judgment to be formed upon the question whether this compromise was for the benefit of the infant were not fairly and properly brought under the Master's consideration that there was a suppression of material facts which were within the knowledge of Lord Mostyn and his advisers, and were not within the knowledge of the plaintiff or of those who acted for him. It may be said, perhaps, that the Master was satisfied with the information laid before him and called for no further information, but the question is not whether the Master called further information, but whether the parties having this further information in their possession were justified in withholding it. I am satisfied that information was withheld which was material to have been given, and which, if given, might have altered the conclusion arrived at, and I think the fact of such information having been withheld amounts in the eye of this Court to fraud.

Thus it will be seen that the learned Lord Justice lays down that an obligation is laid on both the parties to place all the materials in their possession where minors are concerned in order to enable the Court to judge the fairness of the compromise and it is not, as the learned Subordinate Judge thought, that it is not incumbent upon Somanatha to lay before the Court any fact which was within his knowledge. It is also clear from this judgment that there must be a compromise of doubtful rights and there must be equal knowledge on both sides. It was therefore held that where a party seeking the benefit of the compromise against a minor had no honest belief in the claim he was making, and the claim was absolutely without any foundation as in 45 Cal 17,[8] or 47 Mad 181,[9] the compromise would not be allowed to stand. The reason assigned is that the Court is not apprised of the real state of facts and the compromise sanctioned by the Court must be deemed to have been passed on a misapprehension of a material fact having been withheld by the party who had knowledge of the same. Such withholding would in law amount to fraud. Failure of a guardian to do his duty in getting all the available material and placing it before the Court would amount to gross negligence and stand on the same footing. In this connexion I should like to refer to the observations of the Vice-Chancellor Malins in (1874) 18 Eq 573[10] at page 576 :

> The question which I have to decide is, whether this infant, on whose behalf a decree was taken by consent in 1867, is to suffer by any negligence or want of knowledge on the part of her then next friend. I am clearly of opinion she cannot be called upon to endure that inconvenience. . . . The proposition that an infant of tender years may have her whole fortune wrecked by the neglect of her next friend is so monstrous that I cannot pay attention to it. She is entitled to have a next friend who is diligent and will protect her interests.

Judged in the light of these principles, can the compromise in this case stand? On the facts I have already indicated, there can be no question that Lingaraju and his brothers became divided in or about 1890, and for a period of 30 years to the date of Lingaraju's death, they have been in separate enjoyment and possession of the properties. So far as Somanath is concerned, he was fully aware of the fact that he was a member of a divided family and this is strongly evidenced by his own conduct in executing Ex. E. This fact and this document were entirely within his knowledge and control and it was not made available to the Court or to the legal advisers on behalf of the plaintiffs. He chose to assert a claim which to his knowledge is false and the compromise was arrived at on the footing that they were members of an undivided family whereas in fact it was not so. If the guardian ad litem had taken a little more care, as was expected of her, she could have got possession of Exs. E and K and the documents which were executed by Panchakshari, namely Exs. D.1 and C, which place beyond doubt all the facts of partition and support Ex. J. If these documents had been placed before the Court, it cannot be said that the Court could have sanctioned the compromise because, even apart from these documents, the state of facts was that the parties were admittedly in separate enjoyment and possession of the properties for a considerably long time which might have supported an inference of division. The learned Subordinate Judge observes:

> The partition alleged was not evidenced by a partition deed which was in the possession of the party against whom the compromise is now sought to be vacated on the ground of its wilful suppression by him. The partition is inferred from certain transactions and conduct of the parties which was within the knowledge of both parties, and in fact the plaintiff's next friend's case itself was that. Under such circumstances Somanath was not under any obligation to prove the opposite of his contention.

The learned Judge's view is entirely wrong. The document Exs. E, K, D.1 and C would have removed any doubt that might have remained at the date of the compromise in regard to the inference of division to be drawn. There is thus in this case both a withholding of real facts by the father of the defendant and a neglect of duty on the part of the guardian. Neither Kumaraswami Sastri J. nor Reilly J. in A I R 1929 Mad 96[6] lays down that under such circumstances the compromise can be upheld. Referring to 45 Cal 17,[8] Kumaraswami Sastri J. observed thus:

> It was held that on the facts disclosed in that case there could be no question of a bona fide compromise where a person knowingly raises a dispute by setting up a false claim which he knows to have no foundation and in fact induces the other party to settle the claim.

Referring to 47 Mad 181[9] Reilly J. observed thus :

> It is clear that in both cases the Court which sanctioned the compromise was deceived and fraud was practised upon it. Each of those compromises must have come before the Court concerned as a compromise reached by free consent by parties negotiating at arm's length with full knowledge of the facts. But in each case it was found that the compromise was procured by the party who knowingly put forward a false plea and procured by taking advantage of the helplessness of the minor's guardian. In each of those cases there was plain fraud on the Court, which was deceived into believing that there was a compromise by free consent when there was no such consent.

In this case it will be seen that the plaintiffs represented by their grandmother had no independent male advice and she was on the date of the compromise in distressed circumstances. She lost both her daughter and son-in-law. It appears from the evidence that one Sanyasi, P. W. 5, was present at the compromise but he does not appear to have taken any part therein. Whatever it is, it has not been shown that the documents referred to by me and the materials which they disclose were available to the plaintiffs' grandmother, whereas they were certainly available to Somanath. The decision of the Privy Council in 45 Cal 17[8] is very instructive. In that case a decree for partition passed with the sanction of Court was set aside. There were two brothers Durga Prasad Singh and Bishambar Prasad Singh. Bishambar Prasad Singh died on 2nd August 1902 leaving his only child the plaintiff and his widow Mussammat. Durga Prasad filed a suit on 7th May 1904 against Mussammat and her daughter the plaintiff who was a minor then and also at the time of the Privy Council decision. In that suit Durga Prasad stated that his brother Bishambar Prasad had been born blind and therefore excluded from inheritance to his father's estate. In that suit there was a compromise by which Durga Prasad gave to Mussammat six villages. A suit was filed to set aside that compromise on the ground that it was to the detriment of the minor plaintiff. The Subordinate Judge in that case set aside that compromise but the High Court reversed it. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee found that on the evidence it was fairly clear that Bishambar Prasad was not born blind and was entitled to a half share in the property. They further found that the fact of congenital blindness should have been known to every member of the family if it was a fact. Their Lordships also noticed that Mussammat, the mother of Durga Prasad, did raise an objection in certain succession proceedings on behalf of Durga Prasad that Bishambar Prasad was born blind. The parties apparently in view of this contention had the matter compromised by the sanction of the Court. But their Lordships nevertheless observed that Bishambar Prasad was admittedly not born blind on the evidence and that Durga Prasad could not possibly have been in doubt as to that fact, and had, when he induced Mussummat to enter into the compromise, no honest and bona fide belief in the claim which he was making and therefore the compromise which was made in pursuance of it, could not be allowed to affect in any way the right of the minor. Similarly, a partition decree was set aside in 47 Mad 181[9] on the ground that the compromise decree proceeded on the footing that there was no division in status in the family, whereas in fact there was a knowledge of division in the person who set up that there was no division.

In the view I have taken on the facts there is nothing in 28 Bom L R 362[5] which would help Mr. Lakshmanna. In that case the actual question that arose for decision was how far the learned Judge who granted the sanction can be guided by the representations made by the counsel before him and how far he should call further information. In that case Madgavkar J. after pointing out that the considerations in deciding the question of sanction are entirely different from the considerations in deciding the issues and the reliefs in a contested suit, observed thus:

> If among the materials in para. 62 of the plaint there had been one or two documents or facts, so decisive in favour of the present ancestral character of the Girgaum property, and Gordhandas had deliberately omitted or even perhaps failed to bring them to the notice of the Court, when it considered the question of sanction, then possibly it might have been a plausible contention for the appellants that Gordhandas's action fell within the rule of culpable or wilful negligence tantamount to fraud or misrepresentation on material facts, which alone in law would enable the minors to avoid the compromise sanctioned.

In that case the father in entering into the compromise was acting as guardian on behalf of his minor sons. In regard to the conduct of the father Madgavkar J. observed thus:

> In my opinion no negligence—much less gross negligence — least of all misrepresentation or fraud, on the part of Gordhandas, is proved in the materials or the sanction obtained.

I have already shown in this case that Somanath withheld all the available material in his possession. I have also pointed out that even if Somanath was not guilty of any fraud, the grandmother, by neglecting to get all the material which was available and place it before the Court, was guilty of gross negligence. This would entitle the Court to say that all the material which ought to have been placed before the Court was not placed in considering the question of sanction and set aside the decree. As there is thus both fraud on the part of Somanath and neglect on the part of the guardian, I am of the opinion that the compromise decree in this case should be set aside. In the result, I reverse the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge and restore that of the learned District Munsif. But I direct each party to bear his own costs throughout. Leave to appeal refused.

 (a) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 28 (7) — S. 28 (7) enunciates English doctrine of relation back — Only difference is as to time when insolvency commences.

Section 28 (7) enunciates the well-known doctrine of relation back in insolvency law. The principle underlying the doctrine is that the adjudication has relation to the act of bankruptcy and the property vests by relation from that time in the trustee in bankruptcy. This is the English rule. Under the English law, the insolvency commences either on the date of the presentation of the petition or from the earliest act of insolvency committed within three months before the date of the presentation of the petition and the title of the trustee in bankruptcy relates to that date. Under S. 28, Cl. 7, however, the insolvency commences from the date of the presentation of the petition. The only difference is as to the point of time when the insolvency commences: (1893) 1 Q B 455; A I R 1916 Mad 144 and A I R 1927 Mad 163, Rel. on. [P 20 C 1]

(b) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 78 (2) Suit on annulment of insolvency on pro-note executed before petition for insolvency—Plaintiff can deduct only period from order of adjudication to order of annulment and not from date of petition for insolvency.

The statute of limitation for the maintenance of an action at law, once it has commenced to run, will continue to run in spite of the presentation of the petition in insolvency. If the order of adjudication is made, the operation of the statute of limitation is suspended till the date of the annulment, and if the adjudication is annulled the period between the date of the adjudication and that of annulment is excluded and the statute begins to run immediately on annulment. If no order of adjudication is made, the insolvency does not save the claim from being barred by limitation. So a prudent creditor, in order to keep his debt alive, will be obliged to file a suit to save it from the bar of limitation in spite of insolvency. Thus a plaintiff, who sues after annulment of insolvency on a promissory note, executed before the petition of insolvency is filed, is entitled to deduct for limitation, only the period from the order of adjudication to the order of annulment and not from the date of the presentation of the petition: A I R 1935 Mad 817, Dissent.; A I R 1927 Mad 163, Disting.; Case law referred. [P 20 C 2; P 21 C 1; P 22 C 1]

(c) Limitation Act (1908), S. 19 — Word 'prescribed' includes period which party is entitled to exclude under any law in force.

The word 'prescribed' in S. 19, Lim. Act, is not limited to the period in Sch. 1 of the Act; in computing the period prescribed, the period which a party is entitled to exclude under any law for the time being in force, e. g. S. 78 (2), Prov. Insol. Act, should be taken into account: A I R 1935 P C 85, Rel. on. [P 22 C 2]

Venkataramana Rao J.—This appeal raises a question of limitation. The suit was to recover a sum of money due in respect of two promissory notes dated 7th May 1922 executed by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff. Subsequent to the execution of the promissory notes, the creditors presented a petition in insolvency on 7th November 1922 to adjudicate the defendant an insolvent. The order of adjudication was passed on 21st March 1923. The adjudication order was annulled on 5th April 1928. The suit was instituted on 23rd October 1930. The plaintiff seeks to escape the bar of limitation by alleging that he is entitled to exclude the whole period during which the proceedings in insolvency were pending, that is from 7th November 1922, the date of the presentation of the insolvency petition, to 5th April 1928 the date of annulment. The contention of the defendant is that the plaintiff is entitled to exclude only the period from the date of the order of adjudication, namely 21st March 1923 to 5th April 1928, the date of annulment. The learned District Judge has given effect to the contention of the defendant and hence this appeal is preferred by the plaintiff. The question is, is this view right? The relevant provision bearing on the question is S. 78, Cl. 2, Provl. Insol. Act, which runs thus:

> Where an order of adjudication has been annulled under this Act, in computing the period of limitation prescribed for any suit or application for the execution of a decree (other than a suit or application in respect of which the leave of the Court was obtained under sub-s. (2) of S. 28 which might have been brought or made but for the making of an order of adjudication under this Act, the period from the date of the order of adjudication to the date of the order of annulment shall be excluded.

Unfettered by authority, according to the plain terms of the section, the period of exclusion is that from the date of the order of adjudication to the date of the order of annulment. But it is contended that the date of the order of adjudication in S. 78, Cl. 2 must be deemed to be the date of the presentation of the petition, and reliance is placed on S. 28. Cl. 7, Prov Insol Act, which provides that > an order of adjudication shall relate back to and take effect from the date of the presentation of the petition on which it is made.

The contention is outlined thus. S. 28, Cl. (7) is a general section relating to 'adjudication and the consequences of adjudication' and must govern the interpretation of the expression 'the order of adjudication' wherever it occurs in the Act. This contention seems to be untenable on an examination of the principle underlying that provision and other sections of the Act where the expression 'order of adjudication' occurs. S. 28, Cl. (7) only enunciates the well known doctrine of relation back in insolvency law. The principle underlying that doctrine is that the adjudication has relation to the act of bankruptcy and the property vests by relation from that time in the trustee in bankruptcy, i. e. the title of the trustee in bankruptcy or receiver relates back to the commencement of the insolvency. This is the English rule. Under the English law, the insolvency commences either on the date of the presentation of the petition, or from the earliest act of insolvency committed within three months before the date of the presentation of the petition and the title of the trustee in bankruptcy relates to that date. It is also the law under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. Under S. 28, Cl. 7, Prov. Insol. Act, the insolvency commences from the date of the presentation of the petition. We do not think that a different rule from the English law and that laid down in the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act was intended to be laid down in regard to the legal consequences flowing from the doctrine of relation back. The only difference as pointed out by Mulla (page 413) is as to the point of time when the insolvency commences.

The whole of S. 28 deals with the property of the insolvent and the order of adjudication relates back and takes effect from the date of the presentation of the petition vesting the property of the insolvent in the Official Receiver as from that date. As explained in (1893) 1 Q B 455,[1] the result of the relation back is that all subsequent dealings with debtor's property must be treated as if the bankruptcy had taken place at the moment when the act of bankruptcy was committed.

Vide 39 Mad 693[2] at p. 699 wherein (1893) 1 Q B 455[1] is cited with approval. And the same view is expressed in 50 Mad 300,[3] a case on which strong reliance was placed by the appellant, where the learned Judges observe at p. 302 that:

> Section 28, Cl. 7, is a general clause which applies to all dealings by or with the insolvent, unless any particular dealing is expressly exempted from its operation.

The question now under consideration has nothing to do with any dealing by or with the insolvent but it relates to the maintainability of the action on a debt due by him in a Court of law. The relevant provisions which deal with the effect of the insolvency on the maintainability of the actions are Ss. 28, 29 and 78. It will be seen from these three sections that the material date is the date of the order of adjudication. The insolvency does not per se bar the maintenance of an action. Before the date of the adjudication the action is maintainable without the leave of the insolvency Court, but thereafter, that is after the date of the order of adjudication, the action is not maintainable without leave. If an action has been commenced before the date of the order of adjudication, the moment the order of adjudication is passed, the Court before which the suit is pending can either stay or continue it. The statute of limitation for the maintenance of an action at law, once it has commenced to run will continue to run in spite of the presentation of the petition in insolvency. If the order of adjudication is made, the operation of the statute of limitation is suspended till the date of the annulment and if the adjudication is annulled, the period between the date of the adjudication and that of annulment is excluded and the statute begins to run immediately on annulment. If no order of adjudication is made, the insolvency does not save the claim from being barred by limitation. So under the law as it stands, a prudent creditor in order to keep his debt alive, will be obliged to file a suit to save it from the bar of limitation in spite of insolvency. No doubt, it may in a sense be futile, if an order of adjudication takes place; but he runs the risk of losing the claim altogether if no adjudication is made.

If the presentation of an insolvency petition per se laid the creditor under a disability, of course, it may stand to reason that the time occupied by the pendency of the insolvency, that is, commencing from the date of the petition should be excluded; but since the creditor is placed under no such disability, the Legislature has provided that the period during which he is under a disability should be excluded. Considerable reliance was placed on the decision in 58 Mad 1032.[4] It was no doubt held in that case that a suit filed and a decree obtained therein after the date of presentation of the insolvency petition and before the date of adjudication were held to be incompetent because the leave of the insolvency Court had not been obtained before the commencement of the suit. With respect, we are unable to follow this decision. If a suit can be filed by a creditor without leave before the date of the order of adjudication and the Court before which it is filed has jurisdiction to entertain it and pass a decree thereon, it is difficult to understand how an order passed ex post facto by another Court could render such a suit incompetent and the decree passed therein void. The learned Judges have not given due weight to the word 'thereafter' in S. 28, Cl. 2 and to the provisions of S. 29 of the Act which clearly apply to a state of affairs which occurred in the case with which they were dealing. Under S. 29, it was competent to the Court to pass an appropriate order and it was not necessary to pronounce the suit to be incompetent or the decree void. It seems to us that to apply the doctrine of relation back to a suit instituted before an order of adjudication is against the plain language of S. 28, Cl. (2). The view expressed by Ramesam J. in 53 M L J 142[5] seems to be sound, viz.:

> Once the order (adjudication) is made, the effect created by it is, by a legal fiction, taken to relate back to the presentation of the petition or in other words the commencement of the insolvency. For all purposes of the Insolvency Act, this fiction has to be used and it is a very useful fiction; but outside those purposes, it has no place. The filing of a suit prior to the adjudication may be regarded as being outside these purposes with reference to the provisions of S. 28, Cl. (2).

The result of the decision in 58 Mad 1032[4] is that if a creditor files a suit without obtaining leave of the insolvency Court before the date of the order of adjudication, his suit is incompetent; but if he does not file a suit and no order of adjudication is made, he may find his claim barred. We do not think that such a state of affairs was contemplated by the Legislature in enacting S. 28, Cl. 7, and we are therefore unable to adopt the interpretation placed by the learned Judges in 58 Mad 1032.[4] Again, an examination of several other sections of the Act does not lead to the conclusion that wherever the date of the order of adjudication occurs it must mean the date of the presentation of the petition. The Legislature has kept in view the distinction between these two dates. For example, see Ss. 30, 74, Cl. (5) and Proviso to S. 55 where the contrast between the two dates is clearly brought out. There is no direct decision on the point with which we are now dealing, but our attention has been drawn to certain observations in two reported cases, viz. 51 Mad 862[6] and A I R 1933 Rang 75.[7] In both these cases, the question was whether a creditor is entitled to rely on S. 78 (2) in regard to a suit filed while the insolvency proceedings were pending and there was no annulment of adjudication. The learned Judges in both the cases rightly held that S. 78 (2) would not apply. In 51 Mad 862,[6] there is an observation to the following effect:

> If the order of adjudication is annulled, the right to proceed against the insolvent would revive and the period during which the insolvency proceedings were pending would be excluded if the person wishes to proceed against the insolvent or his property.

We do not think that the learned Judges meant, having regard to the context, that the insolvency proceedings would include for the purpose of exclusion under S. 78 (2) the period between the date of the presentation and the date of adjudication. In A I R 1933 Rang 75[7] no doubt there are observations to the effect that the whole of the proceedings commencing from the date of the presentation of the petition should be excluded; but the observations are entirely obiter and are not necessary for the decision of that case. Again, considerable reliance was placed on a recent decision reported in (1937) 1 M L J 637,[8] where it was held that even though a debt is barred before the date of adjudication, it can be proved in insolvency under S. 34 (2). It seems to us that it is unnecessary to examine the correctness of the decision for the purpose of this case; probably that decision may be explainable upon the principle that once the order of adjudication is made, the administration of the insolvent's estate is under the supervision of the bankruptcy Court and all the property is vested or must be deemed to have vested in the trustee in bankruptcy from the date of the presentation of the petition by the doctrine of relation back and the trustee in bankruptcy is deemed to be a trustee for the creditors who cannot plead the statute of limitation against the creditors for whose benefit he is administering the estate. This seems to derive support from the decision in 2 Glyn & J 46 & 330[9] cited with approval in (1914) 2 Ch 68,[10] where Channell J. observed thus:

Ex parte Ross[9] shows that in the bankruptcy a debt does not become barred by lapse of time if it was not so barred at the commencement of the bankruptcy, and of this there can be no doubt, but this is only in the bankruptcy.

The proof of bankruptcy is one thing and the maintainability of an action in a Court of law is another. However, as we have stated, we think it unnecessary to express an opinion in regard to the construction of S. 34, as the debt in the present case was not barred on the date of the adjudication. We therefore hold that under S. 78 (2) a creditor is entitled to deduct only the period from the date of adjudication to the date of annulment. The decision of the lower Court is therefore correct and we accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal No. 450 of 1931.

This appeal also raises the same question of limitation, but the facts are slightly different. The material dates are as follows:

The date of the pronote	8th January 1920.
The date of the presentation of the petition in insolvency	7th November 1922.
The date of adjudication.	21st March 1923.
The date of the annulment of the adjudication.	5th April 1928.
Acknowledgment of the debt.	6th June 1927.
The date of the filing of the suit.	23rd September 1929.

But for the acknowledgment relied on, the suit would be obviously barred by limitation in the view we have taken in the connected Appeal No. 449 of 1931. The question is whether the acknowledgment on the said date would not save the bar of limitation. The learned District Judge has held that the acknowledgment relied on cannot have the effect of extending the time on the ground that it was made after the period of limitation had expired. It seems to us that this view is wrong. Under S. 19, Limitation Act, where before the expiration of the period prescribed for a suit an acknowledgment of liability is made, a fresh period of limitation shall be computed from the date of the acknowledgment. The word 'prescribed' in S. 19, Limitation Act, is not limited to the period in Sch. 1 of the Act; in computing the period prescribed, the period which a party is entitled to exclude under any law for the time being in force, should be taken into account. This is clear from the recent decision of the Privy Council in 57 All 242,[11] where their Lordships observe thus:

> In order to ascertain what is the date of the expiration of the prescribed period, the days excluded from operating by way of limitation have to be added to what is primarily the prescribed period.

If this principle is given effect to, there can be no question that the acknowledgment in the present suit was made before the expiration of the prescribed period. The suit is therefore in time. We therefore reverse the decision of the learned District Judge and pass a decree in favour of the plaintiff for the amount claimed with interest at six per cent. from the date of the plaint with costs here and in the Court below.

Respondents.

Civil Revn. Petns. Nos. 227 to 231 of 1936, Decided on 28th April 1937, from decrees of Dist. Munsif, Cocanada, in S. C S. Nos. 402, 403, 404, 492 and 628 of 1935.

Madras Local Boards Act (14 of 1920), S. 228, Sch. 4, Rr. 11 and 28—Professional tax—President, Panchayat Board, rejecting assessee's returns and making assessments arbitrarily — Assessee making payment and appealing against assessment—Board rejecting appeal— Suit by assessee for refund of tax illegally collected—Suit held was maintainable as R. 11 of Sch. 4 was neglected—Tax held was paid under R. 28 and as such was not voluntary.

The assessees sued the Panchayat Board to recover the profession tax paid by them on the ground that the Board acted improperly in rejecting the return of income submitted by them and that the President acted illegally in fixing the assessment himself in an arbitrary manner without having regard to R. 11 (4) of Sch. 4. Before filing the suit, the assessees appealed against the assessment to the Board after paying the tax but the appeal was rejected. On behalf of the Board it was contended that the suits were not maintainable in virtue of the provisions of S. 228 and that as the assessees had made a voluntary payment of the profession tax, a claim for a refund of them could not be allowed :

Held that S. 228 did not protect assessments from impeachment in a Civil Court as it had not been shown that the return of income of the assessees was incorrect. The President had entirely neglected the provisions of R. 11 (2), (3) and (4) and so the suits were maintainable.

Held further that though payments were made without any protest accompanying them, they were not voluntary, because under R. 28 of Sch. 4 of the Act no appeal to the Panchayat Board would be heard unless the tax had been paid or deposited in the office of the Panchayat Board and therefore a payment made under a statutory provision as a condition precedent to get an official act done, which but for such payment would not be done could not be said to be voluntary : A I R 1937 Mad 559 ; A I R 1929 Mad 179 ; A I R 1934 Mad 420 and A I R 1937 Mad 559, Disting.

Order.—The suits, the subject of these civil revision petitions, were for a refund by the petitioner Panchayat Board of profession tax illegally collected from the respondents. The points for consideration are common to all the petitions and in the lower Court were dealt with in one judgment and I propose to do the same. The plaintiffs were all served with notices under S. 97, Local Boards Act, calling upon them to file returns of their income or profits for the half-year ending 30th September 1934. They duly filed returns, but the President of the Panchayat Board deeming the returns to be incorrect, fixed an assessment himself and served notices on the plaintiffs directing each of them to pay profession tax in respect of their separate assessments. All the plaintiffs appealed to the Board and the appeals appear to have been dismissed as being out of time although from the judgment it is not clear whether all were dismissed on that ground or which, if any of them was dismissed, on the merits. The defendants raised various defences amongst which two have been argued in this Court, namely that the suits were not maintainable and that the payments of profession-tax made by the plaintiffs were voluntary payments and therefore no claim for a refund of them could be allowed. The first point depends upon whether the provisions of the Local Boards Act have in substance and in effect been complied with and on this point the District Munsif finds that those provisions have not been complied with and that the levy was altogether illegal. With this conclusion I entirely agree. The power of the President of the Panchayat Board to make an assessment himself on a reputed income basis only arises in the event of the assessee's return being incorrect and not otherwise. The District Munsif seems to assume that the returns were not correct, but it appears to me that they were. At any rate it has not been shown satisfactorily before me that any of the returns were not correct. He therefore had no power at all to make an assessment under Sch. 4, R. 11 (2) (3) and (4), Local Boards Act, but assuming, as the District Munsif did, that the President was entitled to make such assessment under Cl. (3) of the rule, he has, in the opinion of the District Munsif, had no regard whatsoever to the provisions of R. 4 which reads :

> The President may when classifying any company or person under sub-r. (3), do so on general considerations with reference to the nature and reputed value of the business transacted, the size and rental of residential and business premises, the quantity and number of articles dealt with, the number of persons employed and the income-tax paid to Government.

With this conclusion I entirely agree. The assessments in question appear to be entirely arbitrary. At any rate no attempt was made to show that they proceeded upon any basis and I am certainly of the opinion that the provisions of sub-cl. (4) were entirely neglected. S. 228, Local Boards Act, only protects assessments from impeachment if the provisions of the Act have been in substance and effect complied with and having regard to the neglect of the very material provisions it is clear that the suit is maintainable in a Civil Court. On the defence that the payment was a voluntary one and its refund cannot be claimed, 45 M L W 489[1] was cited by Mr. K. Bashyam Ayyangar as decisive of this question in his favour. The headnote of that case reads :

> Where a person, on whom the Municipality had served a notice of demand of profession tax which stated that in default of payment his property would be distrained, paid up the tax and subsequently brought the present suit for refund of the tax paid on the ground of non-liability to pay that tax, held that the conventional threat of distraint contained in the ordinary notice of demand was not a real threat operating on the mind of the payer without which he would not have paid and hence the payment must be held to be voluntary and irrecoverable as such.

This matter was also considered by Pandalai J. in 67 M L J 566.[2] 45 M L W 489[1] however does not govern this case. The payments in respect of which the claim for a refund was made were payments made after an appeal preferred against the assessment had been dismissed by the Municipal Board to whom the appeal lay and it will be seen from the judgment of Mockett J. that although dissatisfied with the decision the assessee continued to pay the tax from 1928 until 1930 and without any protest accompanying the payments. In all the cases the subject of these petitions, the payment of profession tax, was made before or at the time the appeals against the assessment were lodged and it is here that R. 28 of Sch. 4 of the Act applies. That rule provides that no appeal to a panchayat shall be heard (1) unless it reaches the office of the panchayat within 30 days after the tax complained of has been demanded, and (2) unless (except when the President otherwise directs on the ground of poverty) the tax in respect of which the appeal is presented has been paid or deposited at the office of the panchayat within the period specified in Cl. (1). It is clear therefore that if R. 28 (2) had not been followed the appeals could not have been heard. It is a condition for hearing the appeal that the tax must first of all be paid and it is by force of that statutory provision that the tax was paid and the respondents had no alternative but to pay it if they wished their appeals to be heard. It seems to me to follow clearly that if the appeals had resulted in a reduction of the assessment, the local authority would have been bound to refund the excess payment. How therefore can the payment be described as in any sense a gift? Some authorities were cited on this question in addition to those already referred to, but I do not think that on the facts of this case any authority is needed to reach the conclusion that the payments here were involuntary. However, I would refer first of all to 55 M L J 770.[3] There a claim was made to recover an amount wrongly paid in respect of income which was not assessable under the Act and it was held that the payment was made under a mistake of the general law of British India applicable to all persons in the position of the assessee holding permanently settled estates, and not under duress or coercion and consequently the amount could not be recovered. After dealing with a number of authorities where payments wrongly made were held to be irrecoverable as not made under duress and therefore voluntary, Devadoss and Mackay JJ. on page 776 say :

> The case would be different if for the purpose of getting an official act done a person pays something more than what is proper, for in order to get the act done he must pay the amount demanded, otherwise the act would not be done. In such cases it can be said that the payment is not a voluntary payment nor is it a payment made under a mistake of law. The cases in (1887) 56 L J Q B (N S) 457[4] and (1853) 8 Ex 625[5] are cases where in order to get a certain thing done, the plaintiff had to pay the amount demanded. In (1887) 56 L J Q B (N S) 457,[4] the Corporation of Exeter exacted harbour dues from the plaintiff in respect of exempted articles. The plaintiff paid in ignorance of the exemption. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover back the money so paid.

After quoting from the judgment of Lord Coleridge C. J. they add :

The plaintiff in this case could not have landed his limestone, the article exempted, without paying harbour dues. In (1853) 8 Ex 625[6] the facts were that the plaintiff's clerk applied to the defendant, a parish clerk, for liberty to search the register book of burials and baptisms. He told the defendant that he did not want certificates but only to make extracts. The defendant said the charge would be the same whether he made extracts or had certificates. The clerk searched through four years and made 25 extracts, for which the defendant charged him 3 s. 6 d. each and he accordingly paid the defendant £ 4-7-6. It was held first that the charge for extracts was illegal since 6 & 7 Will. IV, Ch. 86, S. 35 only authorizes a charge for a search and for a certified copy and secondly that the payment was not voluntary so as to preclude the plaintiff from recovering back the excess. Parke B, observed: "In the first place I think that there is evidence that this payment was not voluntary but necessary for the exercise of a legal right".

In 67 M L J 566,[2] the case already referred to, Pandalai J. distinguishes between voluntary and involuntary payments; but that case is distinguishable from this on the ground that the payments there were not made in order to get the appeal heard and the facts were similar to 45 M L W 489.[1] In my view, the payments here were involuntary payments and on this ground the plaintiffs were entitled to make a claim for a refund and, as the suits were maintainable and the assessments made by the President were arbitrarily made without regard to the provisions of the Act, it follows that the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed. The District Munsif has awarded them the sums found to be due calculating the assessment on the basis of income tax returns and no point was taken before me that the basis adopted by him was incorrect.

All the C. R. Ps. will therefore be dismissed with costs in each of them. I observe that in the lower Court the District Munsif disallowed the plaintiff's costs because he thought that they had made false returns which provoked the defendant to act in this manner. On that assumption with which I by no means agree, he was entitled to make that order as to costs. Here different considerations apply, because the petitioners did not remain satisfied with the lower Court's order but have further pursued the matter to the High Court and without success and must therefore suffer the natural consequences. Although I am not influenced at all by it in making my order as to costs, I feel bound to observe that the procedure adopted by the President of the panchayat Board as it appears from the facts was grossly irregular and his conduct is certainly not such as to inspire confidence in the minds of others.

Second Appeal No. 523 of 1933, Decided on 25th March 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Cuddalore, in A. S. No. 116 of 1932.

(a) Debtor and creditor — Debtor making gift to creditor of amount equal to or greater than debt — Question whether such payment is towards satisfaction of debt due is question of fact—Rule of English law that it is to be taken in satisfaction of debt due does not apply to India.

Where a debtor who owes a certain amount to a creditor makes a gift or legacy to him of an amount either equal to or greater than the amount of the debt due to him, the question whether such payment is towards satisfaction of debt due is a question of fact and the decision of such question depends on the facts of each case. [P 26 C 1, 2]

The rule of English law that a gift or legacy in such case shall be taken in satisfaction of the debt due is not favoured and is not made applicable to India by the framers of the Succession Act : 37 Bom 211 and A I R 1932 P C 13, Rel. on; 7 Beng L R 643 (P C), Ref. [P 26 C 2]

A Mahomedan widow sued to recover the dower debt of Rs. 700 from the other heirs of her deceased husband. The defendants relied on a statement made by her in other proceedings that she had received a gift of Rs 3,000 from her husband just before his death and contended that the statement amounted to an admission by her that her dower debt was satisfied by such gift. No evidence was let in by the defendants to prove that the gift was in payment of the dower debt :

Held that as there was no evidence adduced by the defendant to prove that the gift was in satisfaction of the dower debt, if the statement was to be relied upon as an admission, it should be taken as an admission that the amount was paid to her by way of gift and not by way of satisfaction of her dower debt. It was not open to the Court to go behind the admission. The defendants were therefore liable for the dower debt. [P 27 C 1]

(b) Mahomedan Law — Dower — Liability of heirs of deceased is not personal but only with respect to assets of deceased.

Where the widow of a Mahomedan sues the heirs of her deceased husband for the recovery of her debt, a personal decree cannot be passed against them but a decree for realising the debt only from the assets of the deceased in their hands can be passed. [P 27 C 1]

Judgment.—This second appeal arises out of a suit instituted by the plaintiff to recover a sum of Rs. 700 as and by way of dower settled as payable to her at the time of her marriage in October 1925 by her deceased husband. The husband died in 1927 and the suit was instituted in 1930 within three years from the date of his death. Both the Courts have concurrently found that the husband did agree to pay the said sum of Rs. 700 as and by way of dower. This cannot be challenged in second appeal. The main defence of the contesting defendants who are the other heirs of her husband was that in a petition for leave to sue in forma pauperis in regard to some other claim the plaintiff stated that her husband shortly before his death, while he was very ill, had made provision for her by giving certain immovable properties and also by making a gift of Rs. 3,000 in cash; and therefore the dower debt must be deemed to have been discharged by this gift. It may be noted that the factum of gift is not admitted by the defendants but her claim was sought to be defeated on the strength of the admission made by her. Both the lower Courts proceeded to treat the case on the said footing and not upon the factum of the said gift having been made. The learned District Munsif non-suited her on the ground that having regard to the fact that the husband made a gift of such a large sum of money he could not be deemed to have died indebted and therefore a presumption must be drawn that the dower debt was discharged by the gift. The learned Subordinate Judge reversed this decision and held that the alleged gift of Rs. 3,000 must be deemed to have been made by way of a present having regard to the disproportion between the amount of the debt and the amount of the gift, though he might be inclined to draw the presumption if the amounts were equal. It is against this decision that the second appeal has been preferred. The question whether a certain payment was made by way of gift or by way of satisfaction of a debt is a question of fact as pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 7 Beng L R 643.[1] But Mr. Padmanabha Iyengar contends that in arriving at this finding of fact the learned Subordinate Judge has misdirected himself on the question of law bearing on the case. He contends that the correct principle of law to be applied here should be that if a debtor makes a gift or gives a legacy of an amount either equal to or greater than the amount of debt, the presumption must be that the gift or legacy was by way of satisfaction of the debt. In support of this contention he relies upon the rules of English law in regard to the satisfaction of debts by legacies which is thus stated by Jarman in his book on Wills, Edn. 7, at p. 1136 :

> If one being indebted to another in a sum of money does, by his will, give him a sum of money as great as or greater than the debt without taking any notice at all of the debt, this shall nevertheless be in satisfaction of the debt so as that he shall not have both the debt and the legacy.

Mr. Jarman points out that this rule is however not favoured and that equity leans against legacies being taken in satisfaction of debts. So far as India is concerned, this rule is not favoured and has not been adopted by the framers of the Succession Act : vide S. 164 of the old Act and S. 177 of the present Act. Beaman J. in 37 Bom 211[2] at p. 214 is inclined to think that the rule of English law is not applicable to this country. Their Lordships of the Privy Council had to consider this question in 6 Luck 556[3] with reference to the case of a dower. In that case it was found that a Mahomedan husband agreed to pay at the time of the marriage a large sum of Rs. 50,000 by way of dower and that before his death he made gifts of amounts from time to time which far exceeded this sum of Rs. 50,000. Under such circumstances it was contended that the dower debt must be deemed to have been discharged by this gift; and 7 Beng L R 643[1] was relied on before their Lordships of the Privy Council. But their Lordships doubt if the principle has any application as between husband and wife and distinguished the decision in 7 Beng L R 643[1] as having given on the facts of the said case. In 7 Beng L R 643[1] the thing transferred was substantial in amount and character, the equivalent of that which the debtor ought to have provided for the creditor. On the facts of that case, their Lordships said a presumption ought to be drawn that the payment must be deemed to have been made in satisfaction of the debts and not by way of additional gift. Further their Lordships point out being a question of fact as both the Courts below concurrently found that the payment was in satisfaction of the debt, that they were not inclined to disturb the said findings; and they have not enunciated any general rule or presumption.

In this case what is relied on is not the fact of the gift but an admission made by the lady of having received such a gift. If the statement made by the lady is to be relied on as an admission, her admission is that the amount was paid by way of gift and not as satisfaction of debt. It is not open to the Courts to go behind the said admission. The plaintiff swore that the payment was made not in satisfaction of the dower debt. There is no evidence contra. The defendants have not chosen to adduce any evidence to repudiate her claim. And further the fact that the amount of gift is considerably larger than and quite disproportionate to the amount of the debt, is an additional factor to be taken into consideration as was done by the learned Judge in the Court below in arriving at the conclusion whether the payment was made in satisfaction of the debt or by way of gift. It seems to me that the finding arrived at by the lower Court is correct and I do not see my way to disturb it. In the result the second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs. It has been brought to my notice that the lower Court has granted a personal decree. The lower Court is wrong in doing so. The amount should be realised only from the assets of the deceased.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 369 of 1936, Decided on 20th August 1937, from order of Court of Small Causes, Trichinopoly, D/- 2nd December 1935.

(a) Execution—Transfer of decree to another Court for execution — Report under S. 41, Civil P. C. not sent to original Court—Application made to transferee Court for arrest of judgment-debtor is one presented to 'proper Court'.

Unless in the order of transfer there is any express limitation of the purpose for which the transfer is made, there is no reason to limit the powers of the Court to which a decree has been transferred for execution. The original Court of jurisdiction is deprived of its power to execute its decree once the decree has been sent to another Court for execution till the certificate under S. 41 is received from the transferee Court. [P 28 C 2]

Where therefore a decree has been sent to another Court for execution and no report has been sent to the original Court under S. 41, so as to deprive the transferee Court of the power to execute the decree any further, an application to the transferee Court for arrest of the judgment-debtor is one made to the 'proper Court' : A I R 1916 P C 16, Rel. on; A I R 1933 Mad 110, Disting. [P 28 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 39 (1) (a), (b) and (c) —Even in cases falling under Cls. (a), (b) and (c), powers of transferee Court are not limited.

It is not right, even in a case falling under Cls. (a), (b) and (c) of S. 39 (1), to limit the powers of the Court to which the decree is sent. Those clauses only deal with the circumstances justifying a transfer and they need not necessarily define the powers of the Court to which decree is sent for execution, because that is provided for in other sections of the Code : A I R 1936 Cal 521, Not foll. [P 29 C 1]

Order.—The only question arising for determination in this revision petition is whether the execution petition which has been ordered by the lower Court was in time. This in turn will depend upon whether an earlier execution petition dated 7th August 1933, which was presented to the District Munsif's Court, Trichinopoly, was an application in accordance with law and presented to the "proper Court". The decree under execution is one passed by the Court of Small Causes at Trichinopoly. As one of the defendants had immovable property within the Munsif's jurisdiction, the decree seems to have been transferred to the District Munsif's Court and as a result of proceedings taken there, some of the immovable properties were sold and part of the decree amount realized during the year 1930. On 7th August 1933, an application was made to the District Munsif's Court for an order to arrest defendant 2 in the suit. It is now common ground that by that date no report had been sent by the District Munsif's Court to the Court of Small Causes so as to deprive the Munsif's Court of the power to execute the decree any further. The Munsif's Court however returned the application of 7th August 1933 with the following endorsement:

> Legal representatives cannot be added in this Court. This application may be made to the Small Cause Court.

This endorsement refers to the fact that by that time defendant 1 was dead and if the decree-holder wanted to bring his legal representatives on record, an application for that purpose must be presented only to the Court which passed the decree. In answer to this endorsement it was rightly pointed out on behalf of the decree-holder that execution was at that time sought only against defendant 2 and that when he thought fit to take execution proceedings against the legal representatives of defendant 1 he would apply to the Court which passed the decree. For some reason not appearing on the record, the District Munsif's Court nevertheless returned the application stating that the petitioner will apply for re-transfer of the decree to the Small Cause Court and ask for arrest therein. After re-transfer and re-presentation, that petition was dismissed for non-payment of batta by the Court of Small Causes.

It has been argued before me that this petition to the Munsif's Court dated 7th August 1933 is not one presented to the "proper Court" because the transfer to the Munsif's Court must be taken to have been made only for the purpose of proceeding against the immovable properties situate within that Court's jurisdiction and that as the Small Cause Court was competent to issue a warrant for the arrest of defendant 2, the application for that purpose should have been made to the Small Cause Court and not to the District Munsif's Court. I am not able to accede to this contention. S. 38, Civil P. C., provides that a decree may be executed either by the Court which passed it, or by the Court to which it is sent for execution; and in O. 21, R. 10 there is a provision that the holder of a decree who desires to execute it shall apply to the Court which passed the decree, or if the decree has been sent to another Court, then to such Court. S. 42 enacts that the Court executing a decree shall have the same powers in executing such decree as if it had been passed by itself.

Taking these three provisions together, it seems to me that their natural effect is that unless in the order of transfer there is any express limitation of the purpose for which the transfer is made—assuming that such limitation, if any, can control the provisions of the Code as to jurisdiction—there is no reason to limit the powers of the Court to which a decree has been transferred for execution. Indeed it is possible to construe the observations of the Judicial Committee in 39 Mad 640[1] as depriving the original Court of jurisdiction to execute its decree once the decree has been sent to another Court for execution till the certificate under S. 41 is received from the transferee Court. A Division Bench in this Court has distinguished that case in the decision reported in 63 M L J 788.[2] The latter case is clearly distinguishable because the application there was made by the assignee decree-holder for the purpose of having himself recognized as the assignee and it is well settled that an application for that purpose can be made only to the original Court. On the other hand, a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court went so far as to hold that even an application for transfer of the decree to another Court ought not to be made to the original Court before the certificate under S. 41 has been received from the Court to which the decree was first sent for execution. The question I am now concerned with is, however, not whether the original Court retains jurisdiction or not, but what is the extent of the jurisdiction of the Court to which the decree has been transferred for execution.

Mr. Anantha Ayyar seeks to impose restrictions upon its powers by reason of the considerations mentioned in sub-cls. (a), (b) and (c) of S. 39 as justifying the transfer. He concedes that the present case will not properly fall under sub-cl. (a), (b) or (c).

1. Maharaja of Bobbili v. Narasaraju Bahadur, (1916) 3 A I R P C 16=36 I C 682=43 I A 238=39 Mad 640 (P C).
2. Subba Rao v. Ankamma, (1933) 20 A I R Mad 110=140 I C 591=63 M L J 788.

Obviously in a case falling under sub-cl. (d) or in a case falling under Cl. 2 of that section, no such limitation can exist at all. I may add that I do not think it right even in a case falling under sub-cl. (a), (b) or (c) to limit the powers of the Court to which the decree is sent. Those clauses only deal with the circumstances justifying a transfer and they need not necessarily define the powers of the Court to which the decree is sent for execution, because that is provided for in other sections of the Code. I admit that there are observations in A I R 1936 Cal 521[3] which lend some support to Mr. Anantha Ayyar's contention; but, with all respect, I hesitate to follow them. In the present case we do not even have on record the petition on which the original order was made transferring the decree to the District Munsif's Court nor have we even a copy of the order of transfer. It must merely be a matter of speculation as to what the reasons for the transfer might have been. It is also unnecessary in this case to decide on the conflict between 60 Cal 1119[4] and A I R 1936 Rang 184[5], because the application of 7th August 1933 was undoubtedly one for execution of the transferred decree and not for stay of its execution. The revision petition fails and is dismissed with costs.

Public Prosecutor—for the Crown.

Order.—This petition raises an interesting question as to the scope and meaning of certain sections in the Madras Gaming Act (3 of 1930). A "common gaming house" is defined as a place where cards or other instruments of gaming are kept for the profit of the person who owns or occupies the place. In other words it is a place open to all comers for gambling purposes and run by some person for profit either by hiring the room or by hiring the cards, etc. The persons punishable under the Act are the keeper or owner of such a place and persons who frequent such a place for gaming. Gaming in a private house or in a club is not an offence punishable under this Act. S. 9 of the Act contains a presumption that any one found in a common gaming house during gaming was there for the purpose of gaming. S. 7 states that a man may be convicted of keeping a "common gaming house" even though it be not proved that any one played for money in that place. These two sections clearly show that the Legislature was oppressed by the difficulty of obtaining proof in such cases. The greater part of this short Act is in fact devoted to overcoming that initial difficulty by creating special rules of evidence. But it is S. 6 which presents the greatest difficulty. That section read with S. 5 is to the effect that any cards or instruments of gaming found in any place searched under a search warrant issued by a salaried Magistrate or Deputy Superintendent of Police who has reason to believe that the place is used as a common gaming house shall be evidence that such place is used as a common gaming house and that the persons found therein were there for the purpose of gaming, even though no gaming was seen by the search party. The drafting of these sections is certainly defective. It is quite clear, pace the phraseology of S. 6, that cards or instruments of gaming cannot of themselves be evidence of anything.

The obvious meaning is that the finding of cards or of instruments of gaming in such circumstances shall be deemed to be evidence: shall be a ground for the inference that the place is a common gaming house. Now, in most private houses cards or other instruments of gaming are to be found, and therefore there must be some special circumstances to justify the inference that the place is a common gaming house. It is clear that the mere finding of cards or of other instruments of gaming is not sufficient to justify such an inference. The one safeguard provided in the Act for people who have cards in their private houses is that before their houses are searched "a salaried Magistrate" or a "senior policeman" must have reason to believe that their house is a common gaming house. If he thinks he has reason to believe that and issues a search warrant and cards are found, that is evidence that the house is a common gaming house But is it sufficient evidence by itself? Obviously not. The reasons which prevailed with the Magistrate or with the senior policeman to issue the warrant must normally be put before the Court and must be tested before a man can be convicted of keeping a common gaming house on such flimsy evidence. Otherwise, the conviction would be based partly on purely artificial evidence and partly on secret information, which cannot possibly have been the intention of the Legislature. Nor does the language of Ss. 5 and 6 support such a conclusion. There is a world of difference between saying that a certain fact is evidence of something and saying that it is proof of something. In my judgment each case must be decided on its merits and regard must be had to all the circumstances and the discretion of Magistrate to accept a case as proved or to reject it as not proved is wholly unfettered and unaffected by S. 6. All that I am concerned to point out is that if the reasons which induced a Magistrate or a senior Police Officer to issue a search warrant are not put before the Court, the mere finding of cards or instruments of gaming in the execution of such a search warrant, though evidence, ought never by itself to be treated as sufficient evidence, i. e., proof that the place is a common gaming house.

Turning to the present case, petitioner 1 has been fined for keeping a common gaming house and eight others for being found gaming there. The search warrant (Ex. B) was issued by a Magistrate who stated therein that he had been led to believe that the house of petitioner 1 was used as a place for gambling on a large scale. I think it unfortunate that he should confess that he was only led to believe this and shrank from saying plainly that he had good reason to believe it It is also a strange suggestion that the scale on which gambling was indulged in was a relevant consideration. The really important and relevant matter seems to have escaped the Magistrate altogether, viz., whether there was reason to believe that the house was a common gaming house. Moreover, I find that the only evidence offered by the prosecution was the evidence of P. W. 1, the Inspector of Police who conducted the search. He says that at 11 P. M. on the night of the search he was informed that gambling was going on in petitioner 1's house on a large scale. He hastily obtained a search warrant and raided the house at 12-30 A. M. In these circumstances and in this state of the evidence, if the Inspector had found only cards or instruments of gaming, I would certainly not have been able on the principles above laid down to support the convictions in this case. But what he did find was this. The doors were shut and bolted inside. Through a window the nine petitioners were observed gambling. Eight of them were pilgrims who were visiting that town for a religious festival. When the police broke in, the gamblers scattered, put out the lights, hid, pretended to be asleep. In all, the police seized Rs. 171 4 10 from the petitioners and by far the bulk of this (Rs. 107-3-2) was found on the person of petitioner 1 the owner of the place. In these circumstances, I think it is a proper inference that the place was kept by petitioner 1 as a common gaming house. I am not prepared therefore to interfere in revision with the convictions or with the sentences imposed. I dismiss the petition.

Second Appeal No. 1313 of 1932, Decided on 20th August 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, West Tanjore, in A. S. No. 135 of 1931.

Court-fees Act (1870), S. 7, Cl. (i) — Sub-mortgagee asking for sale of property originally mortgaged — Court-fee payable is on amount due on original mortgage.

The court-fee payable by a sub-mortgagee asking for a sale of the property mortgaged to the original mortgagee is on the amount due and payable in respect of the original mortgage under S. 7 (i), and not on the amount due and payable in respect of the sub-mortgage. [P 31 C 2]

S. Narasimha Ayyengar — for Appellant.

Judgment.—The question in this second appeal is when a sub-mortgagee sues for sale of the properties mortgaged to his mortgagor, i. e. the original mortgagee impleading the original mortgagor, should he pay court-fee on the amount due under the original mortgage or on the amount due under the sub-mortgage? Ordinarily a sub-mortgagee's right, just like any other mortgagee, is to enforce his mortgage and bring to sale the property mortgaged to him, i. e. the interest of the mortgagee in the property mortgaged to the latter. But the law permits him to enforce sale of the said property under circumstances and conditions which would entitle the original mortgagee to bring the properties to sale. To such a suit the original mortgagor should be made a party. The principle on which this is allowed is that a sub-mortgagee's claim is by a derivative title from the mortgagee and he is in fact an assignee of the mortgagee. When a mortgagee effects a mortgage of his mortgage interest, he is creating a transfer of his right as mortgagee though not absolutely. Therefore, when a sub-mortgagee sues for sale of the property, he is enforcing the right of the original mortgagee. The amount claimed by him is the amount due under the said mortgage though as sub-mortgagee he is only entitled to a portion of the said amount. He is in effect asking for a decree for the amount due on the original mortgage and in default the property should be brought to sale. No doubt in such a suit accounts between the original mortgagor and the original mortgagee on the one hand and the latter and sub-mortgagee on the other are taken once for all and the respective claims of the three parties are adjusted and settled at the same time: see 20 Mad 35[1] at page 39. But this does not alter the nature of the claim. A reference to the form No. 11 of Appendix D to the Civil P. C., which provides for a decree in a case where the sub-mortgagee sues for sale of the property, renders the position very clear. A decree is passed on the basis of the original mortgage and the principal, interest and costs payable are calculated as if a suit was instituted by the original mortgagee, and on payment into Court of the said sum so declared to be due to the original mortgagee by the original mortgagor, the sub-mortgagee is at liberty to apply for the payment of the amount due to him.

It is thus clear that the amount claimed in the suit is the amount due to the original mortgagee. Under S. 7, Cl. (i), Court-fees Act, the court-fee has to be paid on the amount claimed. It is contended that the sub-mortgagee is entitled only to claim the amount due on his mortgage and he cannot claim more and therefore he cannot be made to pay more court-fee by virtue of the fact he is asking for sale of the property. This contention proceeds on the misconception of the right the sub-mortgagee is enforcing in the suit. The property mortgaged to him is the original mortgagee's interest and ordinarily he can only claim a sale of that interest for the realization of the amount due on his sub-mortgage, and if he was therefore praying only for this relief the amount claimed by him in the suit would be the amount due on his sub-mortgage in which case the court-fee will be on that basis. But when he is asking for the sale of the property, the amount claimed by him is as assignee of his mortgagor the amount due to the latter, and it is only after getting a decree for the same he gets a subsidiary relief for the payment of the amount due to him. I am therefore of opinion that the court-fee payable by a sub-mortgagee asking for a sale of the property mortgaged to the original mortgagee is on the amount due and payable in respect of the original mortgage and not on the amount due and payable in respect of the sub-mortgage. The property mortgaged to the appellant in this appeal comprised two sets of properties: (1) A schedule properties wherein his mortgagor had an absolute interest, and (2) B schedule properties wherein he had the interest of a mortgagee. In so far as the appellant prayed for the sale of B schedule properties, the view of the lower Courts that he should pay the court-fee on the amount due and payable in respect of the original mortgage, is correct; and the second appeal therefore fails.

1. Muthu Vijaya v. Venkatachallam Chetty, (1897) 20 Mad 35=6 M L J 285.

Further judgment. — After I delivered judgment in this case last week, Mr. S. Narasimha Iyengar submitted that his client may be permitted to pay the deficit court-fee and that the issue as to the amount payable under the original mortgage may be directed to be determined, and I directed the office not to issue the decree and to have this matter posted to be spoken to. After hearing the learned counsel on both sides, I vary my prior order and give leave to the appellant to pay the deficit court-fee in regard to the relief claimed in respect of the B schedule properties; and on payment of the said fee the Court of the District Munsif of Tanjore is hereby directed to determine the issue relating to the discharge raised in issue 2 and give the appropriate relief to the plaintiff. The case is therefore remanded for disposal to the District Munsif's Court of Tanjore. The appellant will pay costs of the respondents in this second appeal. Time for payment of the necessary court-fee will be one month from the date of the receipt of the order by the District Munsif of Tanjore.

 Contract Act (1872), Ss. 148 and 149— Lady handing over jewels to goldsmith to be melted for making new jewels — Every day lady receiving half-made jewels and keeping them in box in goldsmith's house with key in her possession - Goldsmith held could not be regarded as bailee.

A lady handed over to a goldsmith certain jewels for the purpose of being melted and being utilized for the making of the new jewels. Every evening as soon as the goldsmith's work for the day was over, the lady used to receive the half-made jewels from the goldsmith, and put them into a box in the goldsmith's room and keep the key in her possession :

Held that the mere leaving of the box in a room in the goldsmith's house, when the lady herself took away the key of that room, could not amount to delivery within the meaning of Ss. 149 and 148 and hence the goldsmith could not be regarded as a bailee in respect of the gold or the half finished jewels. Order.—Much as I sympathise with the plaintiff, I am unable to hold that the circumstances disclosed by the evidence warrant the decree which the lower Court has passed against the defendant. The question is whether the defendant can be charged as a bailee and made liable for the loss of some gold belonging to the plaintiff. The evidence shows that the plaintiff arranged that certain jewels which she desired to be made should be got made by certain goldsmiths working in the defendant's house, apparently because there was more convenient accommodation there. The plaintiff admits that she used to attend every day in the defendant's house during the time that the goldsmiths were at work. It is true that even according to the defendant's written statement he received at the outset two old jewels from the plaintiff for the purpose of being melted into gold and being utilized for the making of the new jewels; but any bailment that could be gathered from that admission must be taken to have come to an end as soon as the plaintiff was put in possession of the melted gold. There is nothing in the evidence to suggest that the gold that thus came into the plaintiff's possession was ever thereafter "delivered" to the defendant by the plaintiff. All that the evidence discloses is that every evening, as soon as the goldsmiths' work for the day was over, the plaintiff used to receive the half made jewels from the goldsmiths, put them into a box which the defendant had given her for her use and put the box in a room in the defendant's house. One of the plaintiff's witnesses adds that even the key of that room was kept in the plaintiff's possession. On these facts, I do not see my way to hold that the defendant can be regarded as a bailee in respect of the gold or the half finished jewels.

Under the provisions of Ss. 148 and 149, Contract Act, delivery is necessary to constitute the bailment. It is true that the delivery may be made by doing anything which has the effect of putting the goods in the possession of the intended bailee; but the mere leaving of the box in a room in the defendant's house, when the plaintiff herself took away the key of that room, cannot certainly amount to delivery within the meaning of the provision in S. 149. If on those facts the plaintiff wanted to fasten a liability upon the defendant for the loss of the goods, she must make out an affirmative ground of liability, and cannot ask the Court to treat the defendant as a bailee and throw upon him the onus of accounting for the loss of the jewels. The evidence shows that one morning, when the plaintiff went into the room to take out the jewels for further work, the jewels were found missing. It is not the plaintiff's case that on the previous day she handed over the unfinished jewels to the defendant. I cannot agree with the contention of the learned counsel for the respondent that because in the first instance the old jewels were handed over to the defendant the bailment thereby constituted continued for all time. Every day when the unfinished jewels were handed back by the goldsmith to the plaintiff, the jewels came back to her possession and if at the later stages she desires to throw upon the defendant the onus of exonerating himself from the obligations of a bailee, she must prove some acts whereby the articles could be held to have gone into the defendant's possession. I find no such proof in the present case.

In these circumstances I do not think it necessary to consider whether, even if the defendant could be regarded as a bailee, the circumstances are such as to protect him under Ss. 151 and 152, Contract Act. I must however observe that I see nothing whatever in the evidence and in the circumstances of the case to warrant the learned Judge's suggestion that "it is not unlikely that the defendant appropriated the property and made a show of theft in his house". Though the plaintiff denies any knowledge of the defendant having complained of theft in his house, her second witness admits that the defendant did complain of a theft and that the plaintiff was also aware of such complaint. But in the view that I have taken that no bailment has been proved, it is unnecessary to consider this question further. The revision petition must be allowed and the decree of the lower Court set aside. The petitioner will be entitled to his costs in this Court; but I direct that in the lower Court each party will bear his costs.

VENKATASUBBA RAO AND NEWSAM JJ.

Collector of Kistna, Masulipatam — Appellant.

Sreemanthu Raja Yarlagadda Sivarama Prasad — Respondent.

Appeals Nos. 290 to 295 and 354 to 391 of 1935, Decided on 3rd August 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, Kistna at Masulipatam, in C. C. Nos. 1 etc. of 1935.

Land Acquisition—Melawaram Interest—Method of assessing capital value explained—Gross income minus peshkush and costs of realizing revenue at 10 per cent. is nett income—This nett income multiplied by number of years' purchase according to prevalent rate of interest plus addition of 15 per cent. gives value for compulsory acquisition.

The principles which should be applied in assessing the capital value of the melwaram interest in land may be thus stated. It is necessary to start with the one known fact—the gross income of the zamindar from the land which is being acquired. The next step should be to ascertain the nett income. This can be done only roughly by deducting a proportion of the peshkush payable by the zamindar to Government and also a proportion of the cost of revenue collection and administration. It would be fair and equitable to make a deduction of 10 per cent. of the gross income towards the expenses of a revenue collecting and administrative staff. Having thus ascertained the nett annual revenue of the zamindar from the land being acquired, it must be capitalized by computing the number of years' purchase. Twenty times the nett revenue from property has in the past been commonly taken to be the capital value of any property or interest in property, and the true justification for this was that approximately 5 per cent. was the prevalent rate of interest. But it is clear that the number of years' purchase must depend on the rate of interest prevailing on gilt-edged securities at the time of the acquisition, i.e. on the date of the notification under S. 4, Land Acquisition Act. The higher the rate of interest on that date, the fewer will be the number of years' purchase. Twenty times the nett income would be fair if the prevailing rate of interest was 5 per cent., but if it was 2½, nothing less than 40 times the nett income would be adequate compensation. To the figure thus arrived at must be added the usual 15 per cent. for compulsory acquisition: 16 Mad 369 (P C) and 10 Cal 769, Ref.

Govt. Pleader — for Appellant.

V. Govindarajachari — for Respondent.

Newsam J.—The short question arising for decision in all these appeals is what is the proper method of valuing the melwaram interest in land which is being acquired for public purposes. The method adopted by the Land Acquisition Officer in these cases was to deduct the proportionate peshkush from the melwaram revenue and then to multiply the nett income thus found by 20. The learned District Judge was unable to find a better method but thought that the nett income should have been multiplied by 30. Many of the reasons which he gave for adopting the figure 30 in preference to the figure 20 do not at all commend themselves to us. These appeals have been filed by Government with the object of restoring the award passed by the Land Acquisition Officer. Cross appeals have also been filed by the zamindar.

Now, it seems to us that the principles which should be applied in assessing the capital value of the melwaram interest in land may be thus stated. It is necessary to start with the one known fact—the gross income of the zamindar from the land which is being acquired. The next step should be to ascertain the nett income. This can be done only roughly by deducting a proportion of the peshkush payable by the zamindar to Government and also a proportion of the cost of revenue collection and administration. Neither calculation presents any real difficulty. We think that it would be fair and equitable to make a deduction of 10 per cent. of the gross income towards the expenses of a revenue collecting and administrative staff. Having thus ascertained the nett annual revenue of the zamindar from the land being acquired, it must be capitalized by computing the number of years' purchase. Twenty times the nett revenue from property has in the past been commonly taken to be the capital value of any property or interest in property, and the true justification for this was that approximately 5 per cent. was the prevalent rate of interest. But it is clear that the number of years' purchase must depend upon the rate of interest prevailing on gilt-edged securities at the time of the acquisition, i. e. on the date of the notification under S. 4 of the Act. The higher the rate of interest on that date, the fewer will be the number of years' purchase. Twenty times the nett income would be fair if the prevailing rate of interest was 5 per cent., but if it was $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. nothing less than 40 times the nett income would be adequate compensation. Of course, to the figure thus arrived at must be added the usual 15 per cent. for compulsory acquisition.

Applying these principles to the cases in hand, we find that both the Land Acquisition Officer and the learned District Judge failed to make any deduction from the gross income on account of the costs of a revenue establishment. Further we find that the notifications in these cases were made at the end of 1933 in some cases and at the beginning of 1934 in others, when the rate of interest on gilt-edged securities was approximately $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. In the circumstances we are not prepared to interfere with the District Judge's order adopting 30 years' purchase as the proper estimate of the capital value of the melawaram, but the income to be multiplied by 30 should first be reduced by 10 per cent. in order to arrive at a true estimate of the zamindar's income by allowing for essential establishment charges. We direct therefore that 10 per cent. be first deducted from the gross income to allow for collection charges, then proportionate peshkush should be deducted and the result multiplied by 30. Finally 15 per cent. should be added as compensation for compulsory acquisition. The Government appeals have thus succeeded in part, though not on the grounds urged, while the cross appeals have failed. In the circumstances, each party will bear his own costs in appeals and in the memos of objections. Let these cases fall into two batches (one batch A. S. Nos. 290 to 295 of 1935 and the second batch A. S. Nos. 354 to 391 of 1935) for the purpose of computing the fees between the Government and the Government Pleader.

Venkatasubba Rao J.—I agree. The only real question that these appeals raise is, what is the number of years' purchase at which the rental of the lands acquired should be capitalized? The contention of the learned Government Pleader that there prevails a rule to be rarely departed from that no more than 20 years' purchase should be allowed, does not rest upon any sound principle. What does the 20-year purchase rule imply? It means that the value of the property might be taken to be a capital sum which, if invested at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, would yield an income equivalent to the rent. Thus, if Rs. 500 represent the annual return and the 20-year rule is adopted, the capitalized value of the property would be Rs. 500 x 20, i. e. Rs. 10,000. Now let this sum be invested at 5 per cent. interest. It would yield a return of Rs. 500. Therefore the 20-year purchase rule rests upon this assumption. The owner of the property compulsorily acquired, if paid twenty times the annual rental, would get a 5 per cent. return upon his money (5 per cent. of any given amount being the 1/20th of it). There is another assumption upon which this rule rests, namely that the return expected from immovable property is 5 per cent. and that therefore if the rental is capitalized at 20 years' purchase, the owner would be properly compensated for the acquisition. It will thus be seen that the rule of the number of years' purchase is not a theoretical or legal rule, but depends upon economic factors, such as the prevailing rate of interest. That there is no uniform or rigid principle in regard to the number of years' purchase is illustrated by several decisions. In 11 C W N 875[1] at p. 878 and 16 Mad 369[2] the rentals were capitalized at 25 years' purchase, and in 10 Cal 769[3] at p. 774, 23 years' purchase was awarded.

The return from landed property, generally speaking, reflects the prevalent rate of interest on money investments. One of the criteria in determining the compensation to be awarded is the market value of the land at the date of the publication of the notification under S. 4 (1) (S. 23, Land Acquisition Act). In the present cases the relevant notifications were published towards the end of 1933 and the beginning of 1934. The Government of India loan at that time took the form of a 3½ per cent. issue liable to income-tax. The issue price was reckoned at Rs. 96 per cent. and the loan was repayable at par between 1947 and 1950. When there is definite evidence that the actual return on investments is 3½ per cent., it would be wrong to adopt the arbitrary rule of the 20 years' purchase. The return having been ascertained, the years' purchase is arrived at by dividing 100 by the figure of such return. In the present cases the return is about 3½ per cent. and the number of years' purchase, which it would be right to allow, would therefore be about 30.

The learned District Judge has capitalized the rentals at 30 years' purchase and with his conclusion we agree, although as pointed out by my learned brother, his reasons are wrong. The rent that is to be capitalized is the nett and not the gross rent and the question arises, what should be the deduction on account of collection charges and other contingencies? Here again there is no uniform rule, but having regard to the nature of the property acquired, we think that besides the peshkush, 10 per cent. of the gross collections may be deducted on account of out-goings. On this basis the computation should be made and to that sum will be added the statutory allowance of 15 per cent.

In re K. S. Rathinam Pillai and another — Petitioners.

Criminal Revn. Case No. 228 and Petn. No. 214 of 1937, Decided on 27th September 1937, from order of First Class Subdivisional Magistrate, Mayavaram, in M. C. No 40 of 1936.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 117 (5)—Charge against two persons that they are desperate and dangerous — There can be no intimate connexion between two persons in regard to their character and so joint enquiry cannot be held.

A joint inquiry under S. 117 (5) is out of the question when one charge at least is that two persons are so desperate and dangerous as to render their being at large without security hazardous to the community. There certainly can be no such intimate connexion between two individuals in regard to their characters as to render them liable to a joint inquisition : A I R 1923 All 35; A I R 1925 Mad 189 and 27 Cal 781, Rel. on. [P 36 C 2; P 37 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 110 — Applicability — S. 110 cannot be used against merely undisciplined people as local bosses and faction leaders.

Section 110 is obviously not intended for use against merely undisciplined people such as local bosses and faction leaders to clip their wings, to deplete their resources by an expensive inquiry, to humble their pride by treating them as criminal mad men and to advertise publicly their high-handed behaviour. To apply the section to such as these is undoubtedly to abuse it. The section is intended to protect the public against irresponsible criminal maniacs and desperadoes and the weapon of public opinion is the only one adapted to the suppression of undisciplined local dictators. [P 37 C 1, 2]

(c) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 117 (4) — Conviction by public opinion should take the place of conviction by Court only in exceptional circumstances—Person never accused of any crime—No presumption that he is criminal.

Section 117 (4) is an exception to the general rule of evidence and like all exceptions to be sparingly used and only in exceptional circumstances. Conviction by public opinion should only be permitted to take the place of conviction by a Court in rare and exceptional circumstances, as for example, where the advent of a suspicious stranger in a village coincides with a series of crimes, and suspicion waxes so strong and is so well justified that it may fairly be allowed to take the place of proof and in such unusual circumstances the section sanctions an experimental use of the security sections. But where a person has lived all his life in a locality and has never even been accused before a Court of law for any crime, far less convicted, there is absolutely no justification for any such experiment or for making any presumption that he is a criminal, not to say a habitual criminal. Order. — This is a petition asking the Court to quash security proceedings initiated by the Subdivisional Magistrate of Mayavaram against the two petitioners who are mirasdars and residents of Manigramam. By an order dated 21st November 1936, the petitioners were called upon to show cause why they should not furnish security for their good behaviour for two years. The order stated that it was based on information that they habitually committed the offences of extortion, mischief, theft and assault and were so dangerous and desperate as to render their being at large, without security, hazardous to the community. It purported in fact to be made under Cls. (a), (d), (e) and (f) of S. 110, Criminal P. C. The substance of the information given to the Magistrate was set out in an appendix consisting of 21 heads of charge. 117 witnesses were cited to prove the information. 24 of these were examined between 9th December 1936 and 23rd February 1937 (i. e. in 2½ months) and they were examined by the Magistrate, who is a touring officer, at several sittings in nine different camps in his division. As the end was still not in sight, the petitioners then presented this petition and proceedings were stayed.

Various grounds have been urged on behalf of the petitioners for quashing the entire proceedings ; one grievance is that in 1936 counter-petitioner 1 was shot at and wounded by some members of the opposite faction who were tried and convicted for the offence. Some persons who gave evidence on behalf of the accused in that case are now witnesses for the prosecution in this case. Another ground taken is that the time and place at which the incidents mentioned in the heads of charge took place are not given. Some of the incidents are stale, some were the subject matter of criminal complaints which were dismissed. In the third place it is urged that there is no justification at all for a joint inquiry. It is not even pretended that the two counter-petitioners (petitioners herein) have been habitually associated together or in all the matters now under inquiry. The first incident for example (looting of houses in 1936) relates to counter-petitioner 2 only. His men were tried for this alleged offence and were acquitted. The second incident (extortion of Rs. 2.4.0) relates to counter-petitioner 1 only, according to the evidence of P. Ws. 8 and 9. But there is no indication in the order that both incidents do not relate to both petitioners, and no details of time and place were given for either.

I propose to take this latter point first. S. 117 (5), Criminal P. C., states that where two or more persons have been associated together in the matter under enquiry, they may be dealt with in the same or separate inquiries as the Magistrate shall think just. It has not been denied before me that the two counter-petitioners were not associated together in all the matters under inquiry, and therefore it is not only not just, but it is not legal to deal with them both in the same inquiry. That such a joint inquiry prejudices the counter-petitioners in cases of this nature has been repeatedly laid down. Walsh J. in a case reported in 45 All 109[1] has said :

> Common sense and common justice dictates that proceedings against a man for badmashi should be confined to himself alone, unless the case is that he has a confederate or a partner to whom all the evidence is equally applicable.

And Madhavan Nair J. in a case reported in 47 M L J 689[2] approved of these remarks and further approved of a comment in 27 Cal 781[3] that a joint inquiry is out of the question when one charge at least is that two persons are so desperate and dangerous as to render their being at large without security hazardous to the community. There certainly can be no such intimate connexion between two individuals in regard to their characters as to render them liable to a joint inquisition. On this ground alone, I think, the present proceedings should be terminated.

But there is another and I think an even stronger ground for quashing the present proceedings. Neither of the petitioners has ever been convicted of any crime. A mere perusal of S. 110 is sufficient to show that it is intended to deal with ex-convicts or habitual criminals and dangerous and desparate outlaws who are so hardened and incorrigible that the ordinary provisions of the penal law and the normal fear of condign punishment for crime are not sufficient deterrents or adequate safeguards for the public. As an additional measure of protection against this hopelessly irresponsible class of persons, the section provides that they may be called upon to find truly responsible and reliable persons willing and able to answer for the good behaviour of their proteges. In other words, persons so addicted to crime that the ordinary sanctions of law are powerless to control their incurable proclivities are placed in much the same category as lunatics. They must either find eligible and responsible guardians or be temporarily confined for the public safety.

The section is obviously not intended for use against merely undisciplined people such as local bosses and faction leaders to clip their wings, to deplete their resources by an expensive inquiry, to humble their pride by treating them as criminal mad men, to advertise publicly their high-handed behaviour. To apply the section to such as these is undoubtedly to abuse it. It is only possible to do so by interpreting S. 117 (4), Criminal P. C., as if it laid down a general rule of evidence for every security case. The section is as follows :

For the purposes of this section the fact that a person is a habitual offender or is so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community may be proved by evidence of general repute or otherwise.

The words underlined [italicised] make it quite clear that this is an exception to the general rule of evidence and like all exceptions to be sparingly used and only in exceptional circumstances. The general rule of law, of course, is that every man is presumed not to be a criminal or an offender until he has been found guilty by a competent Court. Conviction by public opinion should only be permitted to take the place of conviction by a Court in rare and exceptional circumstances, as for example, where the advent of a suspicious stranger in a village coincides with a series of crimes and suspicion waxes so strong and is so well justified that it may fairly be allowed to take the place of proof and in such unusual circumstances the section sanctions an experimental use of the security sections. But where a person has lived all his life in a locality and has never even been accused before a Court of law for any crime, far less convicted, there is absolutely no justification for any such experiment or for making any presumption that he is a criminal, not to say a habitual criminal.

In the present case the allegations against the counter-petitioners amount to this : that they are tyrannical and high-handed, self-appointed village dictators ; that they fine poor people who disobey them, force people in a better position to put themselves in their power by executing pronotes in their favour, punish labouring men for alleged disrespect to them (such as not dismounting from a bicycle when passing their house), and even gratuitously interfere in marriages between third parties. As no complaints were ever made by any of the people thus bullied, it is safe to conclude either that they were not themselves wholly blameless and had to acknowledge that rough justice had been done to them or that they admire bullies and like being bullied.

It is only necessary to repeat that S. 110, Criminal P. C., is intended to protect the public against irresponsible criminal maniacs and desperadoes and that the weapon of public opinion is the only one adapted to the suppression of undisciplined local dictators. For the above reasons, I direct that these proceedings be terminated.

K. M. S. R. M. Kannappa Chetti and others — Respondents.

Appeal No. 218 of 1934, Decided on 5th May 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge (Principal), Kumbakonam, in O. S. No. 29 of 1931.

(a) Limitation Act (1908), Arts. 89, 90— Agent serving his principal under salary chit for period of three years—Agent given power of attorney to facilitate conduct of business —On expiry of term, another salary chit executed by which salary and percentage commission were only changed—Suit by principal for accounts on termination of agency alleging excess of authority in certain transactions—Suit held governed by Art. 89 and not by Art. 90 Period of agency under two salary chits held single one.

The defendant was the agent of the plaintiff under a salary chit dated 28th April 1919 which was for a period of three years. He was also given a power of attorney to facilitate the conduct of business. In May 1922 another salary chit was executed wherein the salary and the percentage of commission were varied but the same power of attorney was continued. The business of the agency was terminated on 29th January 1925. The principal instituted the suit for accounts against the agent on 25th January 1928 and in the plaint he also alleged that in certain transactions the agent had acted in excess of his authority. The agent pleaded bar of limitation under Art. 90, and alternatively that the two agencies under the two salary chits should be treated as distinct agencies and the suit in regard to the first period should be held to be barred :

Held that though, as the principal was in possession of the accounts relating to the agent's conduct of the agency, the principal had not to pray for a general accounting and only took exception to particular matter appearing in the accounts and alleged that in certain transactions the agent had acted in excess of his authority, yet the suit was one for accounts governed by Art. 89 and not by Art. 90, and that as the object of the salary chit was only to fix the salary of the agent and as there was a continuous course of management by the agent and no new accounts were opened or no new power of attorney was executed in regard to the second period, the period from 1919 up to 1925 must be considered as one single agency : A I R 1918 Mad 31 and A I R 1917 Mad 455, Rel. on. [P 39 C 1, 2]

* (b) Principal and Agent — Suit for accounts—Agent entitled to share of profits — Interest on capital is not to be charged in taking accounts unless there is agreement to that effect.

The ordinary rule of law as between partners or as between the principal and an agent who is paid for his services by a share of the profits of the business is that interest on capital is not to be charged in taking accounts unless there is some agreement to that effect. [P 40 C 1]

The agreement between a principal and agent provided that 'interest expenditure' was to be allowed before profit was ascertained :

Held that the provision in the agreement meant that payments actually made by way of interest to strangers and not interest on the capital invested by the principal were to be allowed before ascertainment of profit : (1868) 5 Eq 326, Disting. [P 40 C 1]

Where on the date the agent left the business, particular outstandings arising out of credit transactions during the period of the agency were realizable assets, the mere fact that by reason of subsequent events, i. e. on account of change in the situation of the debtors or because of laches or negligence on the part of the principal or his agent in making the collection some of these outstandings have not been realized, should not be insisted on to the prejudice of the agent in calculating the profits in the taking of accounts between the principal and agent. Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit between a principal and his agent. The plaintiff had a cloth shop in Kumbakonam and he was also doing some money lending business there. The defendant became his agent at Kumbakonam under a salary chit (Ex. A) dated 28th April 1919. As usual it was for a period of three years and provided that the defendant should receive a salary of Rs. 50 per mensem. On 18th of May however, the plaintiff gave a letter (Ex. 1) to the defendant which records a previous understanding to the effect that in addition to salary, the defendant was to be paid 5 per cent. of the profits after deducting "interest charges" and other charges. To facilitate the conduct of business, a power of attorney (Ex. B) was executed by the plaintiff in favour of the defendant on 12th November 1920; this was not in terms limited to any specified period. When approaching the expiry of the three years term under Ex. A, the defendant was apparently pressing the principal for increased remuneration and in Ex. 1-a, dated 15th May 1922, the principal wrote to the defendant to say that from 28th April 1922 (when the stipulated term of Ex. A ends) the salary might be fixed according to the scale that might be settled hereafter. Ultimately, on 24th August 1922, a new salary chit (Ex. C) was executed by the defendant and accepted by the principal, under which the defendant was to be paid a salary of Rs. 90 per mensem and the share of profits was fixed at 7 per cent, both to take effect from 13th April 1922. The defendant continued in the business of agency up to 29th January 1925 when he started a new business of his own and left the plaintiff's shop.

A number of allegations were made against the defendant in the plaint, in respect of the manner in which he had conducted the business and in respect of the alleged omissions on his part to render proper accounts and to prepare stock list, outstandings list and so on. On most matters the lower Court has found in the defendant's favour. But as it was of opinion that there had not been a complete rendering of accounts, in the sense contemplated by law as between principal and agent, it passed a preliminary decree for accounts being taken. It is in respect of some of the directions given in that preliminary decree that questions have been raised in the appeal as well as in the memorandum of objections. A general question was also raised in the appeal to the effect that the suit was barred by limitation.

The question of limitation may be disposed of at the outset. On behalf of the appellant (defendant) Mr. K. V. Krishnaswami Ayyar contended that the suit must be held to be governed by Art. 90 and not by Art. 89 and, in the alternative, that even under Art. 89, the two agencies under Exs. A and C must be treated as distinct agencies and the suit must be held to be barred so far as the accounts of the first agency are concerned, because the present suit was instituted only on 25th January 1928. We do not think that either of these contentions is well founded. The present suit is undoubtedly a suit for account, though, as the plaintiff was in possession of the accounts relating to the defendant's conduct of the agency, the plaintiff had not to pray for a general accounting but only took exception to particular matters appearing in the accounts. The mere fact that the plaint also contained allegations that in certain transactions the defendant had acted in excess of his authority will not make the suit any the less one governed by Art. 89 : see 41 Mad 1.[1] The argument founded upon the existence of two salary chits is equally untenable. As has been observed in 31 M L J 685[2] and the connected cases, the principal purpose of the salary chit is to fix the remuneration of the agent. Whether on the termination of the period fixed in the salary chit the agency also terminated or not is a question of fact and not a question of law. The defendant himself in his deposition admits that the object of the salary chit was only to fix his salary ; he adds "the period of business was not fixed, i. e. of the business to be done by me". When it is remembered that there was a a continuous course of management by the defendant and no new accounts were opened for the so-called second period of agency and no new power of attorney was executed in respect of the second period of agency and the increased remuneration provided for under Ex. C is made to take effect not from the date of Ex. C but even from 13th April 1922, which covers part of the period covered by Ex. A, we do not think there is any justification for artificially splitting up the defendant's conduct of the plaintiff's business into two separate agencies. We therefore overrule the plea of limitation.

The main objection taken on the merits in the memorandum of appeal relates to the way in which the lower Court has directed the profits to be calculated for the purpose of determining the five per cent. or seven per cent. payable to the defendant under Ex. 1, as part of his remuneration. The plaintiff had invested some money as capital in the Kumbakonam business. In the deposition he states it was Rs. 21,000. He claims that before the profits of the business can be ascertained for the purpose of calculating the defendant's share therein, interest at reasonable rate on the capital thus invested by him should be deducted. The lower Court has acceded to this contention apparently on the ground that the plaintiff spoke in favour of it in his evidence. The matter is however one of construction of Ex. 1 and not one to be decided on oral evidence.

1. Muthiah Chetty v. Alagappa, A I R 1918 Mad 31=45 I C 430=41 Mad 1.
2. Ramanathan Chetty v. Kasi, A I R 1917 Mad 455=36 I C 804=31 M L J 685.

The ordinary rule of law, as stated in Lindlay on Partnership, Edn. 10, page 465, is that as between partners or between the principal and an agent who is paid for his services by a share of the profits of the business, interest on capital is not to be charged in taking accounts unless there is some agreement to that effect. The decision in (1868) 5 Eq 326[3] carried this rule so far as to disallow interest even in a case where the principal had invested borrowed money in the business. The present case is no doubt distinguishable as one in which there is an agreement between the parties regulating the matter. But in determining the scope of that agreement, one has to remember that such is the rule of law and except to the extent to which the agreement has clearly indicated a different arrangement between the parties, the defendant will be entitled to the benefit of the general rule. There can be little doubt that the present case differs from (1868) 5 Eq 326,[3] so far as any portion of the money invested in the business had been borrowed. Ex. 1 expressly provides that the profits are to be ascertained after allowing for "interest expenditure" but the collocation of the words "interest expenditure" (vatti chilavu) clearly suggests that all that was meant was "charges or outgoings" to be debited to the business on the ground that they had to be paid to outsiders. It seems to us too much to say that the parties intended that the profits realized in the business should be notionally divided into two portions, one to be regarded as interest on the capital invested in the business and the other to represent profits. It is noteworthy that the document does not provide any standard or rate with reference to which the interest is to be so calculated. The use of the expression "vatti chilavu" is more consistent with the view that the parties meant to exclude only the payments actually made by way of interest to strangers. The direction in the lower Court's decree must therefore be varied to the extent that it allows even interest on the plaintiff's capital to be conducted before ascertaining the profits.

The other objection raised by Mr. K. V. Krishnaswamy Iyer in his appeal is against the direction in the lower Court's decree that the profits should be ascertained on the basis of the amount 'actually realised' by the sales or other kind of business done by the defendant after deducting the shop expenses ignoring all bad and irrecoverable debts. This matter assumes importance in the case because the defendant had in accordance with the course of business made sales in credit to a large extent and a considerable portion of these outstandings had not been realised by the time the defendant left the plaintiff's business. The implication of the direction above quoted from the lower Court's decree is that except to the extent to which the amounts due from customers to whom goods had been sold on credit had actually been realised in cash, the business should be deemed to have made no profits at all for the purpose of ascertaining the defendant's share of the profits. This implication is not altogether justified. Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer went to the extreme length of contending that as the debts due from the customers were taken over into the new accounts which the plaintiff opened when the defendant left the shop, all the debts so taken into the new account must be deemed to have been actually realised or at any rate to have been accepted as good assets and the profits should therefore have been calculated on the basis that they all have been realised. We do not think this extreme contention is warranted. The process of a succeeding agent taking over at a valuation the outstandings due during the conduct of a business by a prior agent is no doubt well-known amongst Chetties; but the evidence does not show that any such process was gone through in the present case. The business was a single business and when the defendant left the business the plaintiff had no alternative but to accept all the outstandings as they stood at the time the defendant left the business and make his best efforts to realise them. The mere fact of the entries having been carried into the new books does not justify the inference that all the outstandings were accepted by the plaintiff as good assets.

On the other hand, Mr. K. V. Krishnaswami Ayyar is justified in his contention that where particular outstandings arising out of credit transactions were really realisable assets on the date when the defendant left the business, the mere fact that by reason of subsequent events, i. e. either on account of change in the situation of the debtors or because of laches or negligence on the part of the plaintiff or his agents in making the collections, some of these outstandings have not been realised should not be insisted on to the prejudice of the defendant, even in calculating profits. It is also true that the outstandings need not be classified under these two heads as though they are exhaustive ; it is possible that some outstandings still remain unrealised or have merged in later accounts, without having actually become bad and irrecoverable. This possibility must be ascertained with reference to the facts in each case. The direction in clause (d) of the lower Court's preliminary decree must therefore be varied so as to make it clear that in ascertaining profits for the purpose of calculating the defendant's share therein, the Commissioner and the Court will have due regard to the state of the debtors at the time that the defendant left the business and while the plaintiff will be entitled to exclude the debts which may be actually found to be or to have become bad or irrecoverable through no fault of his or his agent, the defendant will be entitled to have taken into account not merely the outstandings actually realised but the outstandings which might in due course have been realised except for the laches or negligence or undue delay on the part of the plaintiff or his later agents. It was suggested by Mr. K. V. Krishnaswami Iyer that the question as to what outstandings must be treated as bad and irrecoverable must be decided by the Court. This is of course so. But normally the matter will be dealt with in the first instance by the Commissioner and both parties will be at liberty to raise objections before the Court to any opinion pronounced by the Commissioner on this point. Subject to the modifications above indicated, the decree of the lower Court is confirmed and the appeal is otherwise dismissed. As the appellant has succeeded in part and failed in part, there will be no order as to costs in the appeal.

In the memorandum of objections the plaintiff attempts to raise two points : (1) one against the finding of the lower Court as to the defendant's authority to sell goods on credit and (2) the other against the lower Court's finding disallowing the plaintiff's claim in respect of the lace business carried on by him in partnership with one Chellam Iyer. As regards the first point, we see little force in the objection ; not merely has it been the course of business to sell on credit but the evidence also shows that the plaintiff was all along aware of this course having been followed by the defendant and never took any exception. As regards the lace business, the lower Court was right in its view that it had nothing to do with the particular contract of agency to which the suit relates. The memorandum of objections is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 1047 of 1932, Decided on 26th November 1936, against decree of Dist. Court, North Malabar, in A. S. No. 64 of 1930.

 Limitation Act (1908), S. 14 (2)—Order of executing Court on claim under O. 21, R. 58, Civil P. C.—Appeals against, firstly in sub-Court and then to High Court as per law then prevailing—On High Court holding that claimant's remedy was by separate suit, claimant filing suit under O. 21, R. 63—Period covered by appeals held could be excluded in computing period of limitation.

A person preferred appeals to the sub-Court and from the decision therein to the High Court against an order of the executing Court on a claim preferred under O. 21, R. 58, Civil P. C., and on the High Court in appeal [A I R 1927 Mad 1043 (FB)] holding that the claimant's remedy was by a suit, filed a suit under O. 21, R. 63 for setting aside the order of the executing Court and sought to exclude the time taken by him in prosecuting these two appeals in computing the period of limitation of one year :

Held that in view of the decision in 30 Mad 315, holding that claimant's remedy was by an application under S. 47 and not by a separate suit, which was the ruling then prevailing, the person was prosecuting the appeals bona fide in 'good faith' and the failure of the appeals was 'due to a cause of like nature' with want of jurisdiction within the meaning of S. 14, Limitation Act, and that therefore the matter was one falling under S. 14 and the time taken in prosecuting the appeals ought to be exoluded under that section : A I R 1922 Mad 417 and A I R 1935 Mad 731, Disting. [P 42 C 2]

filed this suit on 7th August 1928 to set aside an order passed upon their claim petition on 10th November 1923. Under R. 63 of O. 21, Civil P. C., the suit must be filed within one year from the date of the order and prima facie the suit is long out of time. The plaintiffs claimed that they were entitled to exclude from the period of one year all the time which was taken by them in preferring appeals (A. S. No. 174 of 1925 on the file of the sub.Court and A. S. No. 28 of 1924 on the file of the District Court) from the order of the executing Court dated 10th November 1923. The learned Subordinate Judge reversed the decision of the executing Court by his decree dated 17th July 1925. A second appeal was preferred to the High Court, which was disposed of by the High Court on 11th November 1927. The High Court held that the claim was one preferred under R. 58, O. 21, Civil P. C., and that it was not a matter coming under S. 47 and consequently no appeal lay to the District Court from the order of the executing Court. The learned Subordinate Judge's decree was set aside. This suit was filed, as already stated, on 7th August 1928, and there is no dispute that if the whole period occupied from the date of the preferring of the appeal to the District Court to the date of the disposal by the High Court of the second appeal is excluded, the suit will be in time. The learned District Munsif and the learned Subordinate Judge have held that this is a matter falling under S. 14, Limitation Act, and that the period can be excluded under that section. S. 14, sub-s. 2, Limitation Act, provides that :

> In computing the period of limitation, the time during which the applicant has been prosecuting with due diligence another civil proceeding, whether in a Court of first instance or in a Court of Appeal, against the same party for the same relief shall be excluded, where such proceeding is prosecuted in good faith in a Court which, from defect of jurisdiction or other cause of a like nature, is unable to entertain it.

Mr. Govinda Menon on behalf of the appellant contends that this period cannot be exoluded because the reason, which rendered the plaintiffs' appeal to the District Court infructuous, was not a defect of jurisdiction or other cause of like nature. As to this it must be noted that a Bench decision of this Court reported in 30 Mad 215[1] in a precisely parallel case, had held that the claimant's remedy was by an application under S. 244, Civil P. C., and not by a separate suit. It was only when this case itself was referred to a Full Bench, whose decision is reported in 51 Mad 46,[2] that the decision in 30 Mad 215[1] was overruled and it was held that the proper remedy of the claimant was by means of a suit and not by an application under S. 47. The learned District Munsif and the learned Subordinate Judge are therefore undoubtedly right in saying that the plaintiffs preferred the appeal bona fide and it is not in fact too much to say that if the plaintiffs had attempted to file a suit, their suit would have been rejected at once upon the view of the law expounded in 30 Mad 215[1] and they would have been referred to an appeal. The only other question is whether this is a cause of a like nature with defect of jurisdiction within the meaning of S. 14, Limitation Act. Mr. Govinda Menon relies upon the case reported in 43 M L J 184[3] where it was held that :

> Where a person misconceived his remedy and instead of proceeding by an application to set aside an execution sale brought a suit which was eventually dismissed, the time taken in prosecuting the suit and an appeal therefrom cannot be deducted under S. 14, Limitation Act.

Their Lordships there held that the failure of the appellant in the prosecution of his claim could not be attributed to anything connected with the jurisdiction of the Court. The reasoning appears to be that the plaintiff's suit in that case failed because the plaintiff had no right of suit and not on account of any defect in the jurisdiction of the Court supposing that a suit lay. That reasoning is obviously not applicable to this case. Under the interpretation of the law in 30 Mad 215[1] the plaintiff had no right of suit. He had a right of appeal to the District Court and it was only after the Full Bench decision in 51 Mad 46[2] that it was discovered that no appeal lay to the District Court. On these facts, I am prepared to hold that the failure of the plaintiff in his appeal to the District Court was due to a cause of a like nature with want of jurisdiction. I have been referred to the decision in 68

M L J 487,[4] to which I was a party, but the facts of that case are quite different. That was a question of restitution under S. 144, Civil P. C., in which we saw reason to hold that the proceedings for restitution were not conducted in good faith. It was not possible in that case for the plaintiffs to point to any decision of this Court which would have justified their application by way of restitution.

The only other question in the appeal is whether the properties belong to Krishnan Nair and Ramunni Nair or to the tavazhi to which the plaintiffs Krishnan Nair and Ramunni Nair belong. Mr. Govinda Menon recognizes that this is a question of fact, the decision of which cannot be contested in second appeal. For these reasons, this second appeal is dismissed with costs of respondents 2, 4, and 5. Leave to appeal is refused.

(a) Pardanashin Lady—Execution of deed —Not only execution, but understanding of contents and free and independent will must be proved.

If a person seeks to enforce a deed executed by a pardanashin lady, it is incumbent upon him not only to prove that the bond was executed by her but also that it was explained to her and she perfectly understood its contents and that she executed the document of her own free and independent will. [P 44 C 1]

(b) Evidence Act (1872), S. 70—Execution means not merely signing but due execution according to law—Attestation means due attestation—Question of attestation put in issue — Attestation must be proved before S. 70 can be applied.

The execution contemplated by S. 70 is not a mere signing of the document, but a due execution or execution in accordance with what the law requires for a particular document. What S. 70 says is that there must be an admission of a party to the attested document. 'Attested' in that section means duly attested. So, if a question of attestation is put in issue, it is incumbent upon the party wanting to prove the document that the document has been duly attested before S. 70 can be relied on: A I R 1925 P C 203; A I R 1923 Cal 149 and A I R 1924 Cal 415, Rel. on; A I R 1929 Mad 881, Not foll. [P 44 C 2; P 45 C 1]

 (c) Evidence Act (1872), S. 70—Admissions for dispensing with proof and admissions for evidentiary purposes — Difference between, explained.

The admission contemplated under S. 70 is an admission made for the purpose of or having reference to the suit made either in the pleadings or during the course of the trial. From the scheme of the Evidence Act it is clear that the Legislature contemplates a distinction between admission made for the purpose of dispensing with proof at the trial and evidentiary admission. The scope and purpose of the two classes of admissions are distinct. M. S. Vaidyanatha Iyer — for Respondents.

Venkataramana Rao J. — These two appeals arise out of a suit to enforce a security bond dated 3rd August 1924 alleged to have been executed by defendants 1 to 5. The learned District Judge of Trichinopoly passed a decree for the amount claimed against all the defendants. Defendant 2 has not preferred an appeal and the decree against him has become final. Defendant 1 and defendants 3 to 5 have preferred appeals; Appeal No. 304/34 is by defendants 3 to 5 and Appeal No. 305/34 is by defendant 1. Defendants 1 to 4 are brothers and defendant 5 is their sister. The case of the plaintiff is that a security bond was taken by him for the purpose of securing advances made by him to defendant 1 for carrying on business wherein all the defendants were interested, and that all the defendants agreed to hypothecate the immovable properties specified in the schedule to the security bond as security for the said advances. Various defences are raised by the defendants. Defendant 1 admitted the execution of the bond, but stated that he had made two payments of Rs. 10,000 and Rs. 5,000 and endorsed the same on the last but one sheet of the bond and the plaintiff remitted the balance and there was therefore a discharge of the suit bond, that the plaintiff had torn away that sheet, substituted another for it and sued upon it, and therefore the bond sued on was not duly executed and not validly attested and not enforceable against him. Defendants 3 and 4 stated that when they signed the bond purporting to be dated 3rd August 1924 there were no alterations or erasions and there were no attesting witnesses to the bond and therefore it was not a validly attested document. Defendant 5 denied execution of the bond and stated that she knew nothing about it. Save in regard to defendant 5, there was no specific issue as to the execution of the bond and there was a general issue raised in the case, issue 4:

Is the suit document invalid in part or in whole for all or any of the reasons mentioned in the defendants' written statement?

At an early stage of the case an application was made for raising a specific issue, "(1) whether the security bond was duly attested as required by law", but the application was not granted on the ground that issue 4 would cover it. It may be noticed that no attesting witness has been called to prove the document, but nevertheless the learned District Judge held that the bond was duly executed by all the defendants and the bond is not invalid for all or any of the reasons mentioned in the written statements. It is contended on behalf of defendants 3 to 5 that the document has not been validly proved according to law and no decree can be passed against them; at any rate, so far as defendant 5 is concerned, the validity of the bond has not been established. The case of defendant 5 can be easily disposed of. It is admitted that she is a pardanashin lady. It is settled by more than one decision of the Judicial Committee that if a person seeks to enforce a deed executed by a pardanashin lady, it is incumbent upon him not only to prove that the bond was executed by her but also that it was explained to her and she perfectly understood its contents and that she executed the document of her own free and independent will. The only evidence relating to the validity of the document is the evidence of the plaintiff himself who says that when it was agreed that the bond should be executed by all, he went to defendant 5 who told him that she will execute the bond. Beyond this there is not a scintilla of evidence to show that the bond which is sought to be enforced was the original bond to which she affixed her signature, and that the bond which is alleged to have been executed by her was explained to her and she understood the contents of it. So far as the evidence of the plaintiff is concerned, we think the evidence is such that we cannot act on it; and very rightly the learned District Judge would not base his conclusion in regard to the execution of the document on his evidence. In our opinion the plaintiff has failed to discharge the onus which is incumbent on him to establish the validity of the document against her. We therefore must hold that the bond has not been established to be valid so far as she is concerned. We accordingly allow the appeal with costs so far as defendant 5 is concerned.

So far as defendants 3 and 4 are concerned, it is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that he is relieved of the obligation of calling any attesting witnesses to prove the document by reason of two facts, namely (1) an alleged admission of execution in the written statement, and (2) the admission of the execution of the bond in the power of attorney which was executed by them in favour of defendant 1 for the purpose of registering the bond. Taking the first point, on a perusal of the written statement it will be seen that what defendants 3 and 4 stated is this: they say that they signed the document, but at the date when they signed it there were neither alterations nor the signatures of attesting witnesses; therefore the document now sued on was not the document which they executed and it was not a duly attested document. In our opinion, in substance, the plea is a denial of execution and not an admission of execution. Reliance is placed on S. 70, Evidence Act. S. 70 runs thus :

The admission of a party to an attested document of its execution by himself shall be sufficient proof of its execution as against him, though it be a document required by law to be attested.

The execution contemplated by S. 70 is not a mere signing of the document, but a due execution or execution in accordance with what the law requires for a particular document. S. 59, T. P. Act says :

Where the principal money secured is one hundred rupees or upwards, a mortgage other than a mortgage by deposit of title deeds can be effected only by a registered instrument signed by the mortgagor and attested by at least two witnesses.

For a mortgage of the description contemplated by S. 59—and the suit security bond comes under the description—there cannot be a due execution unless there has been a signing by the mortgagor in the presence of two witnesses contemplated by the said section, and the execution can never be said to be complete unless the deed is duly attested by two witnesses. What S. 70 says is that there must be an admission of a party to the attested document. 'Attested' in that section means duly attested. So if a question of attestation is put in issue, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that the document has been duly attested before S. 70 can be relied on. It is clear from the pronouncement of the Judicial Committee in 5 Pat 58,[1] that where the attestation is disputed, the plaintiff is not relieved of the obligation of calling an attesting witness under S. 68, Evidence Act. Under S. 68, in the case of a document which is required by law to be attested, unless an attesting witness is called it shall not be received as evidence. Therefore he must call an attesting witness. It may be that on the strength of the evidence given by him he may invoke the aid of S. 70. We find that the view which we have taken was adopted in two decisions of the Calcutta High Court, one in 36 C L J 373,[2] which has been followed by another Division Bench of which Sir Asutosh Mookerjee was a member, in 38 C L J 114.[3] The observations of a Division Bench of this High Court in 57 M L J 588[4] indicating a contrary view have been relied on. But we find on a reference to the case that there is no discussion of the question and no reasons are given. We therefore are not inclined to follow this decision in preference to the aforesaid decisions of the Calcutta High Court with which we agree.

The next point relates to the admission in the power of attorney. It is an admission antecedent to the suit. In our opinion, the admission contemplated under S. 70 is an admission made for the purpose of or having reference to the suit made either in the pleadings or during the course of the trial. From the scheme of the Evidence Act, it is clear that the Legislature contemplates a distinction between admissions made for the purpose of dispensing with proof at the trial and evidentiary admissions. The scope and purpose of the two classes of admissions are distinct. The one relates to relevancy and the other relates solely to proof at the trial. Ss. 68 to 71 are based upon the English rules of evidence. According to the strict English rule in the case of documents required by law to be attested, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to call the attesting witness even though execution is admitted by the party to the deed. Later, the rigour of this rule has been relaxed in certain cases, one of such cases being in the case of admissions made for the purpose of a case. The necessity for calling the attesting witnesses and the reasons for the exception have been very clearly stated in (1853) 8 Ex 803[5] at page 807 by Pollock C. B. in the following terms :

> The attesting witness must be called to prove the execution of a deed, for this reason that by an imperative rule of law the parties are supposed to have agreed inter se that the deed shall not be given in evidence without his being called to depose to the circumstances attending its execution. If therefore the attesting witness is not called, the deed cannot be read, because this agreement cannot be broken but any agreement may be waived by the parties to it. If then in the course of the proceedings in the cause the party to the deed admits the execution, or if by his pleadings he does not require the execution to be proved, he may be very reasonably said to have waived the agreement, and the other party, accepting the waiver, does not call the attesting witness.

Thus, as stated by Phipson in his book on Evidence :

> The reason is not that proof by the attesting witness is the best evidence, but that he is the witness appointed or agreed upon by the parties to speak to the circumstances of its execution, and agreement which may be waived for the purposes of dispensing with proof at the trial.

The agreement is therefore with reference to a contemplated litigation and waiver of such an agreement can only arise after the suit is filed. It is thus clear that the English rule is that the admission must be for the purpose of and with reference to a cause, and we do not think that it was the intention of the author of the Evidence Act to depart from the English rule; there is also clear indication that he did not want to depart from it. Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, who it is well known drafted the Evidence Act, prepared the Digest of the Law of Evidence some years later and in his introduction

1. Hira Bibi v. Ram Hari Lall, (1925) 12 A I R P C 208=89 I C 659=52 I A 362=5 Pat 58 (P C).
2. Arjun Chandra v. Kailas Chandra, (1923) 10 A I R Cal 149=70 I C 532=36 C L J 373=27 C W N 268.
3. Benoy Bhushan v. Dhirendra, (1924) 11 A I R Cal 415=74 I C 178=38 C L J 114.

5. Whyman v. Garth, (1853) 8 Ex 803=22 L J Ex 316=91 R R 771.

to it he stated that he framed the Digest on the Evidence Act, and in Art. 66 of his book he clearly states that the attesting witness can be dispensed with only in cases where the admission has been made for the purpose of or having reference to the cause. In 27 Cal 190[6] this view had been taken and the same interpretation was adopted by a Bench of the Allahabad High Court in 38 All 1.[7] Two decisions which have taken a contrary view have been brought to our notice, one 4 Pat L J 511[8] and another 1 Rang 557.[9] On a reference to those cases we find that they state that there is nothing in S. 70, Evidence Act, to limit the admissions only to admissions for the purpose of the case; but there is no discussion of the question at all.

In the circumstances, we decline with respect to follow the said decisions, and we hold that an admission within S. 70 must be an admission made for the purpose of or having reference to the cause either in the pleadings or during the course of the trial. On this interpretation, the admission of execution in the power of attorney cannot be availed of for the purpose of dispensing with the citation of the attesting witness. In the view we have taken, the document must be held not to have been validly received in evidence as against defendants 3 and 4. The question is, what is the relief we should grant having regard to the circumstances of this case? Should we dismiss this suit or give the plaintiff an opportunity of examining witnesses for the purpose of proving that the document has been validly attested? As already indicated by us, except the general issue, no specific issue has been raised in the case. It would have been better if the learned Subordinate Judge before whom the application was made had raised the issue. Probably if the Subordinate Judge had himself tried the case he would have had this fact in view, but as the trial was before another Judge, the importance of this aspect of the matter has not been sufficiently kept in view. And we also think that the observations of the Division Bench of this High Court in 57 M L J 588[4] may have induced the plaintiff's counsel to adopt the attitude that he has taken of not calling the attesting witness. In the interests of justice we think, having regard to the amount of the claim, we should give the plaintiff an opportunity of adducing further evidence in regard to this matter. We therefore frame the following issue:

"Whether the security bond dated 3rd August 1924 has been duly executed by defendants 3 and 4 and validly attested as required by law".

We give both parties an opportunity to adduce evidence in regard to this issue. The learned District Judge is hereby required to submit his finding within two months from the date of receipt of this order and the parties will have 10 days for filing objections after receipt of the finding. We allow 1/3 of the costs of this appeal and 1/5 of the costs in the lower Court so far as defendant 5 is concerned. We allow 2/3 of the costs of appeal to defendants 3 and 4 and the costs in the Court below will be dealt with later.

The other appeal (Nos. 3/50, 305/34) is by defendant 1. The only substantial plea is one of discharge. The lower Court has disbelieved his evidence and found that he has not made out the case set up by him. The plaintiff is a respectable man and carries on a very large business in several places. He has produced his account books, the accuracy of which has not been impeached and no entries of payments are found therein. The learned Judge has acted on these account books and believed the testimony of the plaintiff and his witnesses. On the other hand defendant 1 has chosen to produce only the ledger and has failed to produce the day-book; and the explanation given by him is that the day-book is missing. The lower Court has rightly disbelieved his testimony and declined to act on it. The learned counsel for defendant 1 has not been able seriously to challenge the finding of the learned District Judge. We therefore accept the finding of the learned District Judge and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeals Nos. 160 of 1931, 100 and 101 of 1934, 40 of 1935 and Second Appeal No. 544 of 1933, Decided on 19th February 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Chittoor, in O. S. No. 29 of 1928, etc.

(a) Practice—Witness—Credibility—Inconsistent answers by witness from hearsay — Adverse inference not correct.

The mere fact that speaking from hearsay a witness gave inconsistent answers to certain questions put to him in cross-examination does not justify an adverse contention based upon the alleged inconsistencies. [P 49 C 1]

(b) Limitation—"Kavimera" cess — Person in possession of village liable to pay mera out of his collection of melwaram — Nature of liability, whether personal — Liability is in nature of charge on immovable property — Claim for arrears of mera is governed by Art. 131, Limitation Act.

As long as any person is in possession of the village out of whose income the mera is payable, he is subject to the liability and the liability is not one arising out of his having wrongly made a collection of what he was not entitled to collect but one arising from the fact that out of the collections which as a zamindar he is entitled to make, he is bound to make the disbursement and appropriate only the balance. In that sense, and to that extent, it is a personal liability. It is not one resting on covenant but is in the nature of a charge, because the payment is one which has to be made out of the profits of immovable property. From the mere fact of its being a charge, it will not follow that it cannot fall under Art. 181. As long as any person continues to be in possession of a village out of whose melwaram the mera is payable, he is liable to pay it as a condition of his tenure as a zamindar or other person entitled to possession of the melwaram interest; the liability is virtue tenure. In respect of a claim of this kind, even the suit for payment of arrears due will be governed by Art. 131: A I R 1920 Mad 447, Disting.; I I A 34 (P C); A I R 1915 Mad 664 and A I R 1918 P C 156, Ref.; A I R 1914 Mad 377 (F B) and A I R 1936 Mad 704, Rel. on. [P 50 C 1, 2]

Varadachariar J.—These appeals and the connected second appeal raise more or less the same questions and may be conveniently dealt with together. The suits out of which they arise were instituted by the same plaintiff against persons in possession of different portions of the former Karvetnagar zamindari and the plaintiff claims to recover from them a certain sum of money representing arrears of what is described in the plaint as kavimera on the allegation that more than 200 years ago, there was a grant by the then Rajah of Karvetnagar to the plaintiff's predecessor-in-title of certain inams in the Karvetnagar zamindari and also of a hereditary right to receive a small fraction of the zamindar's melvaram in each village in the zamindari. The arrears were claimed in the various suits for a varying number of years, according as the plaintiff had not received satisfaction in respect of his claims from the various persons in possession for prior periods.

The defences to the plaintiff's claim may be briefly grouped under four heads. It was contended that the right claimed was not one which can be enforced in a Court of law. The alleged payments, if true, must, it was said, have been only in the nature of voluntary payments, if not also in the nature of illegal collections from the ryots. It was next said that the plaintiff had not made out his right as heir of the alleged original grantee. Thirdly, a plea of limitation was raised and lastly, questions were raised as to the form of the decree that the plaintiff was entitled to. It is some consolation to find that all the Courts which had to deal with this litigation have uniformly found in favour of the plaintiff so far as the merits of his claim go. After examining the records of the case, we cannot help expressing our regret that the defendants should have thought fit to re-agitate the merits of a claim which has been put forward successfully in various litigations, at least from 1894.

The first two points above indicated may be briefly disposed of. We are unable to accept the suggestion that the payments, if any, made to the plaintiff or to his predecessor-in-title, were only in the nature of voluntary payments or illegal exactions. As shown by the learned Subordinate Judge who has dealt with the case at considerable length, it is clear that as early as 1810, plaintiff's predecessor-in-title claimed that there had been a grant by a previous Rajah to his predecessor-in-title somewhere about 1690 and that the same had been lost during Hyder's invasion. It is obvious that the then officers to whom that representation was made were satisfied with that explanation for the non-production of the grant. The accounts of the zamindari which have been produced in respect of a period going back to 1832 clearly show that the practice has been for the village officers, in preparing the village accounts, to make a deduction in respect of this kavimera before ascertaining the amounts which they were to remit to the zamindar as his net income from the village. In several mortgage documents executed by previous zamindars, reference has been made not only to meras generally but specifically to this kavimera and it has been directed that the usufructuary mortgagees should appropriate in satisfaction of their claim for interest or of principal only the balance of the village income that may remain after the various meras including the kavimera had been paid. There are also letters of which two may be treated as typical; the first (Ex. G) was written when a widow Venkatarajamma succeeded the previous holder and the other (Ex. G-10) was sent by the zamindar when the plaintiff's guardian made a claim on the plaintiff's behalf; in both the letters reference was made to the obtaining of a succession certificate or to the appointment of the plaintiff's guardian by a Court of law, and directions were given that on the strength of the title thus established, the mera amounts would be disbursed to them in future as before. It is also in evidence that from 1894 plaintiff's title has been asserted and established in various litigations. In the face of this evidence, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that it was in recognition of a hereditary right under a pre-existing but subsequently lost grant that this mera was being paid to the plaintiff's predecessor-in-title and afterwards to the plaintiff.

Before us, Mr. V. V. Srinivasa Ayyangar, on behalf of the Tirupathi Devasthanam, raised a point that if the case was to be treated as one of payment in return for service to be rendered, plaintiff was not merely not rendering service but was incompetent to render such service. We do not think it is necessary to deal with that question, because there is nothing to indicate that this is a service grant. Some reference was made to the possibility of successive grants to each individual and it was argued that as no grant had been made to the plaintiff, he was not entitled to claim payment merely on the ground that his predecessors had been paid the mera; but the evidence to which we have already referred, particularly Exs. G and G-10 establish that it was in recognition of a hereditary right that the payments were being made. The argument about resumption and re-grant seems to rest merely upon a misconception arising from the use of the word 'japti' in some of the documents. It is obvious from the context that reference was made to 'japti' merely because on account of some defect in the claimant's title, as for instance the non-production of succession certificate or the absence of any appointment of a guardian, there was a temporary break in the payments. The use of the term 'jari' which we find was ordered as soon as the defect was cured, is itself a clear indication that it was merely a recognition of a right for the continuance of the payments and not a fresh grant as an act of grace.

It was next said that the payment has been so indefinite as not to suffice to be the basis for a claim on the ground of a lost grant. The answer to this is that the indefiniteness is not in the right to which the plaintiff is entitled but merely arises from the fact that the practice has been to calculate the mera at different rates for different villages, there being no lack of uniformity so far as the rate for each village is concerned. Differences in the rates adopted in different villages might have originated from various causes, but as the same rate had been shown to have been adopted in respect of any particular village throughout the time in respect of which any information is available, we do not think there is any force in the argument based on indefiniteness.

As regards the argument against the proof of the plaintiff's title, the learned counsel laid stress upon the inconsistent statements made by the plaintiff in the witness box as to how he derived his title. At one stage he referred to a will executed by his grandfather's mother; at another stage he described himself only as heir of his grandfather and in the third stage he stated that his maternal uncle had survived his grandfather; but the context in which these statements appear makes it clear that the plaintiff had no personal knowledge in respect of events which happened either during his infancy or before his birth. He stated positively that he had no personal knowledge in respect of the above matters ; that being so, the mere fact that speaking from hearsay he gave inconsistent answers to certain questions put to him in cross-examination does not we think justify a contention based upon their alleged inconsistencies. As we have already pointed out, the plaintiff's right is established by the documentary evidence in the case and so far as his personal claim is concerned, there is the undisputed fact that from 1894 he alone has been putting forward the claims successfully and no other claimant has either come forward or has even been alleged to have a right. We accordingly think that the decision of the Courts below on the first two points is correct.

The third question has been argued before us more fully than the first and the second. In some of the plaints, the claim has been made for a 'money' decree though incidentally reference has also been made to the plaintiff's claim being a charge on the villages. In a few of the plaints, relief has been prayed for by way of enforcement of a charge as well. The question of limitation is material in two of the suits, because in these two suits the claim includes arrears alleged to be due in respect of a period anterior to six years before suit. In A. S. No. 160 of 1931, plaintiff has appealed against so much of the lower Court's decree as disallowed his claim for the period anterior to six years before suit, that is for Fasli 1331. The learned Judge who decided that case purported to follow the decision in 39 M L J 492,[1] and held that the plaintiff's claim cannot be said to relate to a periodically recurring right within the meaning of Art. 131; and as he was also of opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to a charge, he held that the case was not governed by Art. 132. He therefore allowed the claim only for six years prior to suit, i. e. to the extent permitted by Art. 120. On the other hand, the District Munsif, who decided the case out of which S. A. No. 544 of 1933 arises, was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for enforcement of a charge and he accordingly allowed the claim for the whole period, i. e. within 12 years before suit.

In the arguments before us, various suggestions have been made as to the proper Article of the Limitation Act applicable to the plaintiff's claim. On behalf of the defendants, it has been contended that the claim is really one 'for money had and received' and that the plaintiff could only claim the collections made by the defendants within three years of suit. At best, it was said, Art. 120 might apply as the residuary Article and that would justify the award of six years' claim. Reliance was in this connexion placed on the decision in 39 M L J 492.[1] On behalf of the plaintiff, it was contended that the plaintiff was entitled to a charge, that his claim was in any event governed by Art. 131 and that the suit was not analogous to a claim for 'money had and received' but it was against a person who stood in the position of a grantor and was therefore liable to pay.

We are unable to accept the defendant's contention as to the nature of their liability. It is true that the liability is not one descending upon the defendants as heirs-at-law of the grantor nor is it a personal liability in the sense that it will continue to inhere in them even after they had ceased to be in possession of the villages out of which the meras are claimed. This is all that their Lordships of the Privy Council meant when they said that a liability of this kind is not a personal liability but one virtue tenuræ : 1 I A 34.[2] But as long as any person is in possession of the village, out of whose income the mera is payable, he is subject to the liability and the liability is not one arising out of his having wrongly made a collection of what he was not entitled to collect but one arising from the fact that out of the collections which as a zamindar he is entitled to make, he is bound to make the disbursement and appropriate only the balance. In that sense and to that extent it is a personal liability. It is not one resting on covenant but in the nature of a charge, because the payment is one which has to be made out of the profits of immovable property : see 27 M L J 694[3] and 42 Mad 581.[4] See also the Explanation to Art. 132, Lim. may add that from the mere fact of its being a charge, it will not follow that it cannot fall under Art. 131. As long as any person continues to be in possession of a village out of whose melwaram the mera is payable, he is liable to pay it as a condition of his tenure as a zamindar, or other person entitled to possession of the melwaram interest. It was decided by a Full Bench in 38 Mad 916[5] that in respect of a claim of this kind, even the suit for payment of arrears due will be governed by Art. 131 : see also 1936 M W N 742.[6] It is true that on the question of the applicability of this Article to a suit for money, there has been a difference of opinion in other Courts. But, so far as this Court is concerned, the matter must be taken to be concluded by the decision of the Full Bench. It may be, as pointed out in 39 M L J 492,[1] the learned Judges who decided the Full Bench case assumed that the claim is one in the nature of a periodically recurring right; and for the present we are willing to treat that question as open to argument. But if it is a periodically recurring right, a claim for arrears in respect of such right (as much as a mere suit for declaration) is undoubtedly governed by Art. 131, according to the opinion of the Full Bench.

The decision in 39 M L J 492[1] was strongly pressed on us and we were asked to hold that a claim like the present is not one in the nature of a periodically recurring right. We do not think that that judgment is an authority for that position; the case is clearly distinguishable because the suit was not one between the person entitled to the periodical payment and the person bound to make the periodical payment but one between a person who claimed to be so entitled and another person who, he alleged, had wrongly received the payment from the person liable to pay. So viewed, the suit was really in the nature of an action for "money had and received". An examination of the records of that case also shows that the point argued there related not so much to the period of limitation applicable to the recovery of the money but to the period of limitation governing the right to the office itself as between rival claimants. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to be the muttawalli of a mosque and the defendant likewise claimed to be entitled to the office of muttawalli; and on the evidence it appeared that the defendant had been in possession of the office for more than six years prior to suit. What the Court decided was that as the defendant had been in possession of the office for more than six years, the plaintiff's right to the office itself had been extinguished and the mere fact that the Yeomiah allowance might have been an annual payment, would not bring the case under Art. 131. This line of reasoning is quite in accord with the decision in 26 Mad 113,[7] where it was held that if the office is not a hereditary one, six years' possession by a rival office-holder would suffice to extinguish the plaintiff's right thereto and with the right to the office he would also lose the right to receive all payments attached to the office.

That payments like the present will be governed by Art. 131 is now placed beyond doubt by the decision of the Judicial Committee in 58 Bom 306.[8] The facts of that case are very similar to the facts of the present with this difference that the grant relied on there was made by the British Government—no doubt in confirmation of a prior grant which had been made by the Maharaja of Satara—whereas here the grant was made by a former Rajah of Karvetnagar ; the nature of the payment is very similar to the present. Their Lordships have put it as a matter beyond doubt that a claim to a payment of that kind would fall under Art. 131. Our attention was drawn to the decision in 57 M L J 160,[9] where dealing with a claim to a malikana, the Privy Council applied Art. 120. That case is clearly distinguishable, because the question did not arise there between the person entitled to the payment and the person bound to make the payment, but between rival claimants. The nature of the payment in that case was not one which will satisfy the definition of 'immovable property' and therefore Arts. 141 and 144 were excluded; their Lordships accordingly held that a claim of that kind between two rival claimants would be governed by Art. 120.

As bearing upon the question of limitation, we must refer to one other argument advanced by Mr. Srinivasa Ayyangar on behalf of Tirupathi Devasthanam, i. e. that the proper remedy of the plaintiff was to proceed against the ryots and collect his percentage from them and that the persons in possession of the melwaram interest were under no legal obligation to make the collections and pay the plaintiff. If this position were correct, it would no doubt follow that any liability of the zamindars or persons in their position would only be as for 'money had and received'. But we do not think that that is the true nature of the right. The whole course of conduct of the parties and the information available from the accounts negative that description of the plaintiff's right; the matter is put beyond doubt by the positive direction given in Ex. G that the person entitled to the mera should only receive it from the village officers of the zamindar and should not make any attempt to collect the money from the ryots. Indeed, this is the only proper course, when it is remembered that the mera was a deduction from the melwaram interest of the zamindar and was not part of the rent which the ryots had to pay or any liability cast by custom on the ryots. The lower Courts were therefore right in holding that the liability is one cast upon the person in possession of the melwaram interest to make this disbursement before he can appropriate for his own use the rest of the melwaram income. In that sense, it will also be a charge; but in the view that Art. 131 applies to the money claim, it is unnecessary for the purpose of the present case to decide whether the suit will not be governed by Art. 132. We will only point out that Art. 132 will apply only so far as the plaintiff might seek to recover the money by sale of the particular property charged and will not govern his right to a decree against the persons who had made the collection of the melwaram. Having regard to the usage established by the evidence, we think that in this case the charge must be treated not as one available generally against all the villages of the zamindari or even against all the villages in the possession of any particular defendant but as one on each village in respect of the portion of the mera due from that village.

It only remains to deal with the objections raised to the form of the decree. A money decree against any of the defendants in respect of arrears that had fallen due for a period of 12 years or less, provided that the defendant has been in possession of the village for the period of the claim, will be perfectly right. Similarly, a charge decree against the melwaram interest in any village in respect of the amount of mera due from that village will be equally right; but in one or two instances, in the appeals before us, the decrees cannot be said to be limited in that form. We do not however think it necessary to go so far as formally to amend the decree except to the extent to which any greater liability has been cast on the defendants by these decrees having been so framed. As regards the rights of parties in the future, the declaration we have above given will be sufficient to avoid any inconvenience.

We accordingly think it necessary to deal particularly with the decree only in S. A. No. 544 of 1933. Even in A. S. No. 40 of 1935, it has been contended that a liability has been cast upon the defendant in respect of a Fasli prior to his getting into possession, but we think the amount involved is so small that it is hardly worthwhile pursuing that question or modifying the decree. In S. A. No. 544 of 1933, the amount involved is larger. It appears that in respect of some 15 villages in the Pallipat Taluk, the mahant became a purchaser of the equity of redemption prior to the date from which the claim is made in this suit, but the property was nevertheless in the possession of a usufructuary mortgagee who was redeemed many years later. It may be a question whether during the time that the usufructuary mortgagee was in possession, the plaintiff would not nevertheless be entitled to his claim because the usufructuary mortgagee was entitled only to what remained after the meras had been paid. But the usufructuary mortgagee is not a party to this appeal.

It also appears that during the pendency of the redemption suit, instituted by the mahant against the usufructuary mortgagee, the mahant was in de facto possession as receiver; but we are not prepared to hold that the mahant will be liable merely on the ground of his possession as receiver and it will be necessary to consider how the accounts were taken in respect of his receivership and whether the amount which would legitimately have been deducted in respect of the plaintiff's mera was taken into account or not at the time of the passing of the receiver's accounts. Though the point was in a way raised before the District Munsif (who overruled it in the view he took as to the nature of the plaintiff's charge), the matter was not adjudicated on by the lower Appellate Court and the result is that we have very little information on which we can come to a definite conclusion as to the amount which the mahant might be entitled to claim deduction of as representing the period of his possession as receiver. It does not seem to us worthwhile to send the case back for further investigation on this point and the learned counsel on both sides fairly agreed to our suggestion that as the main point was to define the legal basis of the plaintiff's right and of the defendant's liability, it will be sufficient for us to fix a rough and ready figure as the deduction which ought to be allowed in respect of the period prior to the mahant's getting into possession in his own right. We suggested a figure of Rs. 500 and counsel on both sides have agreed to it. The decree of the District Munsif will accordingly be modified by substituting Rs. 838.4.9 for Rs. 1,338.4.9. Interest will also be correspondingly reduced. In the result, A. S. No. 160 of 1931 will be allowed and the plaintiff will be given a decree even in respect of the amount claimed for Fasli 1331. Appeal No. 101 of 1934 also will be allowed in the sense that there will be a finding on Issue No. 14 to the effect that the mera due to the plaintiff is a charge of the kind that we have explained above. We do not think it necessary to make any separate order as to costs in A. S. No. 101 of 1934 or in A. S. No. 40 of 1935 or S. A. No. 544 of 1933; but in A. S. No. 160 of 1931, the appellant will be entitled to his costs and in A. S. No. 100 of 1934, the respondent will be entitled to his costs. Appeal No. 100 of 1934 is dismissed. Appeal No. 40 of 1935 is also dismissed.

BEASLEY C. J., KING AND GENTLE JJ.

Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras—Petitioner.

AR. PL. SP. Manickam Chettiar, Karaikudi — Respondent.

O. P. No. 286 of 1935, Decided on 7th April 1936.

 Income-tax—Receipts in British India—Debts due to foreign business of assessee—Debtor assigning British Indian decree in British India in discharge of his debt—Decree assigned not realized — Held that there was receipt of money or money's worth in British India.

The assignment in British India of a British Indian decree in discharge of a debt due to the assessee's foreign business will amount to an actual receipt in British India at the time of the assignment of money's worth from the foreign debtor even though no money has been realized by the assessee from the judgment-debtor under the decree assigned: (1905-10) 5 Tax Cas 159, Rel. on; A I R 1933 P C 101 and (1924) A C 508, Ref. [P 53 C 1, 2]

M. Patanjali Sastri — for Petitioner.

K. S. Rajagopalachari and K. Rajah Ayyar — for Respondent.

Order.—In this reference the facts are shortly as follows: The assessee is the manager of an undivided Hindu family and inter alia owns a money lending business in Penang, which is outside British India. This business had dealings in current account with M. RM. VL. Penang, the proprietor of which was resident in British India. On 13th August 1931, it was found on a settlement of this account that there was a sum of Rs. 11,700 owing to the assessee. In discharge of this amount, M. RM. VL. executed a promissory note in favour of the assessee. Later, the assessee obtained a decree against the debtor in the Devakottah Sub-Court for the sum due on this promissory note. In the year of account, this decree was satisfied by the debtor selling to the assessee in British India jewels valued at Rs. 7,842.12.0 and agreeing to pay Rs. 15,962.12.0 to A. M. A. Kallal in consideration of which A. M. A. Kallal assigned in favour of the assessee a decree obtained by him in British India against RM. M. RM. who is in fact the brother-in-law of the assessee. These amounts of Rs. 7,842.12.0 and Rupees 15,962.12.0, a total of Rs. 23,805-8.0, were credited in the assessee's headquarters accounts at Karaikudi by the year of account towards the decree debt due by M. RM. VL. and corresponding debits were made against (1) jewel purchase account and (2) RM. M. RM., the judgment-debtor in the decree assigned in favour of the assessee. No amount was collected by the assessee in respect of the assigned decree in the year of account, but the assessee admitted before the Commissioner of Income-tax that a receipt in kind may amount to receipt of money provided what is received is equivalent to money or is money's worth. He did not contend that the assigned decree was unrealizable or was not worth the amount for which it was assigned to the assessee. The Income-tax Officer held that the above transactions amounted to a receipt by the assessee in British India of Rs. 23,805-8-0 out of funds in his Penang business. Out of this sum, the Income-tax Officer computed the taxable profits to be the sum of Rs. 10,900 and accordingly this amount was included in the assessment made upon the assessee for the tax-year 1934-35. The assessee appealed to the Assistant Commissioner and contended that no moneys had so far been realized in respect of the assigned decree, and that the mere assignment of the decree cannot amount to a remittance of the amount covered by the decree within the meaning of S. 4 (2) of the Act. The Assistant Commissioner dismissed the appeal. The Commissioner has now referred to us for our decision the following question:

> Whether the assignment in British India of a British Indian decree in discharge of a debt of Rs. 15,962-12-0 due to the petitioner's foreign business will amount to an actual receipt in British India at the time of the assignment of money's worth from the foreign debtor even though no money has been realized by the petitioner from the judgment-debtor under the decree assigned.

Money can be received in more ways than one, and when the assessee accepted the jewels and took the assigned decree, the debt due to the Penang business was completely discharged and the assets of that business were diminished by, and there was an increase in, the assessee's assets in British India of the sum of Rs. 23,805-8-0. It was argued before us that as the amount of the assigned decree had not been received from the judgment-debtor, the amount of the decree should not be taken into consideration when arriving at a sum for assessment. Assuming that no such moneys had been received, even then, the assessee had by the transactions mentioned transferred into British India assets which he could and in respect of the jewels in fact did realize and he could have realized the assigned decree at any time. In our view, these transactions amount to remittances in British India of moneys or money's worth. Several cases were cited to us by the assessee's counsel amongst them 5 Tax Cas 159,[1] 12 Pat 305[2] and (1924) A C 508.[3] None of these authorities in any way assist the assessee's contention. On the contrary, in the first of the above cases, Lord Trayner at p. 167 says:

> A profit is realized when the seller gets the price he has bargained for. No doubt here the price took the form of fully paid shares in another Company, but, if there can be no realized profit, except when that is paid in cash, the shares were realizable and could have been turned into cash if the appellants had been pleased to do so. I cannot think that income-tax is due or not according to the manner in which the person making the profit pleases to deal with it.

This directly is opposed to the assessee's contention; and our answer to the question referred is "Yes". The Income-tax Commissioner will get Rs. 250 costs.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 1350 of 1936, Decided on 2nd September 1937, from order of Dist. Court, Ramnad at Madura, D/. 3rd October 1936.

 Insolvency—Amendment of pleadings—Acts of insolvency—Petition by creditor—Acts alleged beyond three months of date of petition—Amendment seeking to substitute new acts of insolvency within three months—Amendment held introduced new cause of action and could not be allowed.

A petitioning creditor in his petition for his debtor's adjudication as insolvent, relied on certain acts of insolvency which were committed within three months of the commencement of Court vacation. The petition was filed on the day when the Courts reopened and finding that the alleged acts of insolvency were not within three months of the date of filing, the period of vacation being of no avail to him, he filed another petition for amendment of the former by alleging new acts of insolvency within three months of the date of filing as required :

Held that although Court could liberally allow amendments of insolvency pleadings just as in case of Civil Procedure Code, yet it had its own limitations and an amendment which substituted a new cause of action would not be allowed. Hence the amendment alleging new acts to the prejudice of the debtor could not be allowed : A I R 1935 Mad 857 (F B), Ref.; A I R 1922 P C 249, Rel. on. [P 55 C 2]

Order.—The petitioner seeks in this case to revise the orders passed by the District Judge of Ramnad at Madura on 3rd October 1936 confirming those of the Additional Sub-Judge of Devakottah who had permitted respondent 1 to amend his petition which he had presented to the Court on 3rd July 1934 praying that the petitioner and other respondents to these proceedings be adjudged as insolvents. The petition has been very ably argued on behalf of the parties, and I have been called upon to satisfy myself whether the orders passed by both these Courts were according to law. Respondent 1 had in his petition for the adjudication of the petitioner and the remaining respondents, relied on certain acts of insolvency which were stated by him in para. 6 of his petition. I have examined para. 6 of the petition generally and para. 6 (c) of the petition particularly, and am of the opinion that the transfers referred to in that clause were only those which were alleged to have been effected by the respondents to the petition during the three months prior to the closing of the Court for summer recess on 1st May 1934, and did not cover the acts which might have been committed by them subsequently, i. e. within three months before the actual presentation of the petition.

There is no doubt that the petition for amendment was presented on account of a Full Bench decision of this Court in 58 Mad 794[1] in which, while overruling 39 M L W 449[2] it was held that the period of three months fixed in S. 9 (1) (c), Provincial Insolvency Act, is not a period of limitation but is a condition precedent during which the alleged acts of insolvency must have been committed by the person or persons who is, or are, proposed to be adjudicated. It was accordingly held that the period of vacation would be of no avail to the petitioner in increasing the period within which the alleged acts of insolvency must be proved to have been committed by the respondents, and the provisions of the Limitation Act would not be able to help the petitioner in extending that period on account of the fact that the period of three months expired at a time when the Civil Courts were closed for long vacations.

As the petition for insolvency was in this case presented on 3rd July 1934 and the alleged acts of insolvency were stated to have been committed on 20th February 1934 and 23rd February 1934, an application for amendment was considered to be necessary. This was made on his behalf on 23rd July 1935 with the object of including other acts of insolvency committed by the respondents in April, May and July 1934. These were not mentioned either specifically or generally and were proposed to be brought, as the acts committed before 3rd of April, could not, according to the Full Bench decision, form a basis or ground for adjudicating respondents on the petition presented to the Court on 3rd July 1934. It might be stated in passing that the Full Bench decision gave effect to the rulings in (1879) 12 Ch D 314[3] and (1895) 1 Q B 194.[4]

I have tried to show that this was not, as stated by the District Judge in his judgment dated 3rd October 1936, merely a case of specifying the acts in detail which had already been alleged. The application for amendment was put in with the object of saving it from being dismissed by pleading further acts of insolvency, which according to the Full Bench authority were no longer so and had ceased to be impeachable under the Insolvency Act.

It must be stated at the outset that under the provisions of the Insolvency Act the provisions relating to amendment of pleadings contained in the Code of Civil Procedure would be applicable to the petitions made under the Act. I am also fully aware of the established rules and practice of the Courts, both in England and in India, which act with considerable liberality in the matter of granting amendments and "which should be allowed" as remarked by Lopes L J. in (1887) 19 Q B D 394,[5] however negligent or careless the first omission and however late the amendment, if it can be allowed without injustice to the other side.

But the limitations of this rule have been, on account of a series of authorities, also well defined. As pointed out by Lord Buckmaster in 48 Cal 832[6] at p. 835:

All rules of Court are nothing but provisions intended to secure the proper administration of justice, and it is therefore essential that they should be made to serve and be subordinate to that purpose, so that full power of amendment must be enjoyed, and should always be liberally exercised.

The noble Lord, however, adds the following qualification which should not be lost sight of:

None the less, no power has yet been given to enable one distinct cause of action to be substituted for another.

If I found that respondent 1 was in this case relying on the same cause of action which he had pleaded in the petition or that he was merely asking for further relief or an appropriate remedy which he had on account of some slip or mistake forgotten to ask in his petition, it would not have been necessary for me to examine the orders passed by the lower Courts minutely and revise them if necessary. But when I find that by this device, respondent 1 wishes the Courts to help him in alleging new acts of insolvency, which according to the Full Bench authority had become unimpeachable and ceased to be acts of insolvency in fact under S. 9 of the Act, and on which he neither relied nor did he intend to rely when presenting his petition, the matter assumes a different complexion. If the amendment were allowed to remain, the petitioning creditor would be enabled to substitute new grounds for those which he had set up originally but which are of no avail to him now. This is bound to cause serious injury and grave injustice to the other party which cannot be compensated by costs. It is true that the Courts have wide powers in this matter but they have to be exercised judicially and with care. The effect of granting this amendment would be to clothe the petitioning creditor with rights which he would not have had, if a new petition for insolvency was presented by him on the date on which he applied for leave to amend. In these circumstances I hold that an amendment of this nature prayed could not be granted. The amendment is therefore cancelled and the petition allowed with costs throughout.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 1416 of 1935, Decided on 24th September 1937, from order of Sub-Judge, Ramnad at Madura, D/- 19th July 1935.

(a) Registration Act (1908), S. 17 (1)—"Declare" implies declaration of will and not mere statement of fact — Deed of partition causing change of legal relation is declaration, but not letter containing admission of partition.

The word "declare" in S. 17 (1) implies a declaration of will, not a mere statement of fact. A deed of partition, which causes a change of legal relation to the property divided amongst all the parties to it is a declaration in the intended sense, but a letter containing an admission, direct or inferential, that a partition once took place, does not "declare" a right within the meaning of the section. The distinction is between a mere recital of fact and something which in itself creates a title: 5 Bom 232 and A I R 1932 P C 55, Applied. [P 56 C 2]

(b) Registration Act (1908), S. 17 — Award declaring rights of parties to certain property — Award should be registered — Unregistered award is inadmissible in evidence.

In an arbitration proceeding, the arbitrator was asked to settle disputes between the parties relating to the ownership of the three plots of land. The arbitrator gave his decision that two of the three plots belonged to one party and the remaining one plot to the other party:

Held that the arbitrator's decision in the award operated as a declaration of the rights of the respective parties in these pieces of land, that the award was an instrument which in itself created a title, that therefore under S. 17

registration of such an award was compulsory and that if it was not registered, it was inadmissible in evidence under S. 49 : A I R 1934 Cal 815, Foll.; A I R 1933 All 59 and A I R 1937 Pat 183, Ref. [P 57 C 1]

Order.—This petition raises the question whether an award in arbitration proceedings without the intervention of the Court requires registration before it can be filed in Court. In O. S. No. 19 of 1927 of the Court of the District Munsif, Paramakudi, the respondents sued to recover possession of certain immovable property. During the pendency of the suit, the parties agreed to refer their differences to arbitration, and did so. When they came before the arbitrator it was agreed that he should also settle disputes between them relating to three other pieces of land. The arbitrator in due course gave his award which decided the questions of ownership of the four parcels of land. The award was then filed in Court with a view to its being made a decree. Objections were however raised by the respondents who took advantage of the fact that the award dealt with matters outside the scope of the suit. District Munsif decided that the award could be made a decree of the Court, but only so far as it affected the piece of property in suit. He refused to recognize its validity so far as the other three parcels of land were concerned. This decision was upheld by this Court in an application for revision. The petitioners then attempted to file the award in Court under the provisions of Cl. 20 of Sch. 2, Civil P. C. The respondents objected on the ground that the award had not been registered in accordance with the provisions of S. 17, Registration Act. The District Munsif upheld the objection, and refused to file it. An appeal followed to the Subordinate Judge, Ramnad, but was dismissed. This Court is now asked to exercise its powers under S. 115, Civil P. C., and to direct the District Munsif to file the award.

The only question for consideration is whether the award is a document within the purview of S. 17, Registration Act. Sub.s. (1) sets out what documents shall be registered and they include non-testamentary instruments which purport or operate to create, declare, assign, limit or extinguish, whether in present or in future, any right, title or interest, whether vested or contingent, of the value of one hundred rupees and upwards, to or in immovable property. Sub.s. (2) gives a list of instruments which do not require registration. Cl. (vi) of this sub-section exempts any decree or order of a Court, except a decree or order expressed to be made on a compromise and comprising immovable property other than that which is the subject matter of the suit or proceeding. Before the passing of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Supplementary Act, 1929, this clause also excepted awards, but the words "and any award" which appeared in the Clause were deleted by that Act. Although the reference to awards has been deleted from the Clause, it is argued by the learned advocate for the petitioners that an award of the nature of the one in suit does not come within the purview of sub.s. (1).

The sub-section says that a non-testamentary document which " declares" any right, title or interest in immovable property of the value of one hundred rupees and upwards does require registration and the question resolves itself into whether the award does " declare " a right of this nature. The word "declare" has been the subject of much legal argument in the Courts of this country, but it has now been defined by the Privy Council. In the case in 11 Pat 272=62 M L J 296,[1] their Lordships accepted the definition given by West J. in 5 Bom 232.[2] West J. pointed out that the word ' declare ' " implies a declaration of will, not a mere statement of fact," and went on to say :

> A deed of partition, which causes a change of legal relation to the property divided amongst all the parties to it, is a declaration in the intended sense ; but a letter containing an admission, direct or inferential, that a partition once took place, does not "declare" a right within the meaning of the section.

Viscount Dunedin in delivering the judgment of their Lordships observed :

> Though the word 'declare' might be given a wider meaning, they are satisfied that the view originally taken by West J. is right. The distinction is between a mere recital of a fact and something which in itself creates a title.

1. Bageshwari Charn Singh v. Jagarnath Kuari, (1932) 19 A I R P C 55 = 136 I C 798 = 59 I A 130=11 Pat 272=6 M L J 296 (P C).
2. Sakharam Krishnaji v. Madan Krishnaji, (1880) 5 Bom 232.

The judgment of West J. had been approved of by this Court in an earlier case, 45 M L J 100.[3] The award under discussion declares that the petitioners are entitled to two plots of property and the respondent to the third plot. The relevant portion of the award is as follows:

> On perusing the entire document produced by both the parties, and other witnesses, and also on hearing the oral representations made by both parties, and also on inspecting the locality as desired by both parties, my findings are as follows: (a) that the plots A and C in the sketch submitted herewith, belong to the Mangaputhur Chettis of this place and form part of the Nandavanam attached to Minakshi Sundareswaral temple at Paramakudi, to which defendants 6, 7, 8 and 10 are trustees; (b) that neither the plaintiff nor any other defendants have any right or interest in them (plots A and C); (c) that the plot B in the sketch belongs to the plaintiff, and that the defendants have no manner of right or interest in them.

There can be no doubt that the arbitrator is here declaring who are the owners of these particular plots. He was asked to decide the question of ownership and after hearing the evidence he gave his decision. His award therefore operates to declare the rights of the respective parties in these pieces of land. The award cannot be classified as a mere recital, but as something which in itself creates a title. In 62 Cal 201[4] a Bench of the Calcutta High Court held that registration of such an award is compulsory and that if it is not registered it is inadmissible in evidence under S. 49, Registration Act. Similar decisions have been given by the Allahabad High Court and the Patna High Court: A I R 1933 All 59[5] and 15 Pat 579.[6] There is therefore abundant authority in support of the decision challenged in this petition. The petition therefore fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras— Petitioner.

Tanjore Permanent Fund Ltd. — Respondent.

O. P. No. 146 of 1935, Decided on 26th September 1935.

Income-tax — 'Fund' floated with capital subscribed by shares—Chief income, interest, derived from loans to share-holders — Such income held not assessable because fund was Mutual Benefit Fund Society.

A company was floated with members subscribing its capital by way of share. The main source of income was the interest on the loans advanced to the share-holder members. It also derived interest on its securities etc. In giving the return, the fund did not show the interest derived from the loans to the share-holders as its income. Question was if that income was assessable:

Held the fund though a registered company was in fact a Mutual Benefit Fund Society and that income was not assessable: A I R 1923 Mad 684 (S B), Foll.; A I R 1933 Mad 347. Expl.; 8 I T C 83, Ref. [P 59 C 1]

Order.—The Commissioner of Income-tax has referred to the opinion of the High Court the question "whether the sum of Rs. 61,304 being the income or the profits of the Fund derived from the transactions with the share-holders is liable to assessment." The petitioner is the Tanjore Permanent Fund Limited. It is a company incorporated in 1901 under the Indian Companies Act 6 of 1882, now Act 7 of 1913. The Company started with 2,222 shares of Rs. 45 each share and a nominal capital of Rs. 99,990. The amount of each share is payable in monthly instalments of Re. 1. The share account of each share-holder is closed on the expiry of 45 months from the last date of the month in which he was admitted by his being paid Rs. 50 and then he ceases to be a share-holder. The difference between the amount subscribed by him and the amount paid to him at the end of the 45th month, viz. Rs. 5, is called "guaranteed interest". The Fund accepts deposits from its share-holders on which interest is allowed to them. The Directors are authorized temporarily to borrow from time to time, if necessary, sums to carry on its transactions. The collections of the Fund are used to be lent to the share-holders at specified rates of interest on the security of the shares held by them and also on their other properties. The moneys belonging to the Fund may be invested by the Directors with banks or Co-operative Societies or in Government securities, Treasury Bills or Post Office Cash Certificates. The Fund does not accept deposits from other persons than its share-holders nor does it give loans to outsiders.

The Fund's main source of income is the interest on the loans advanced to the share-holders. It also derives income from interest on the deposits with banks, interest on securities, house rent and other minor items. The excess of interest earned by the Fund over the expenses of the institution and the interest earned by the share-holders is regarded as profits of the Fund out of which 70 per cent. is divided among the share-holders and the balance after paying the legal adviser, remuneration and bonus to the establishment, is carried to the reserve fund. The number of share-holders of the Fund and the amount of shares fluctuate from time to time. On 15th August 1931, as mentioned by the Commissioner, there were on the register of the Fund 9,984 share-holders with 110,740 shares and the subscribed capital of Rs. 49,83,300. For the assessment of the year 1932-33, the Fund returned an income amounting to Rupees 14,178. In submitting this account, it did not include as assessable income a sum of Rs. 61,304, the profits derived from the share-holders. The question referred to us is whether the income-tax can be levied on this amount.

A case exactly like the present one was decided in 47 Mad 1,[1] in which it was held that a fund like this was a Mutual Benefit Society and therefore the receipts from share-holders were not income liable to assessment under the Act. The Income-tax Officer did not follow this decision, as before he completed the assessment, this Court decided the case in 56 Mad 415.[2] That decision was interpreted by him to mean that profits earned by the Fund by lending money may be taxed. He therefore held that the decision in 47 Mad 1[1] was no longer applicable and assessed the fund on the total income including the profits of Rs. 61,304. The Assistant Commissioner confirmed the order of the Income tax Officer. The Commissioner in referring the case to us says that the combined effect of these two decisions and of the decision of this Court in 8 I T C 83[3] is not very clear to him. He also argues that the petitioner Fund is a company carrying on a trade and as such the fact that it carries on the trade with its own customers does not make it any the lesser trader and that the profits resulting from the trade are liable to tax unless specially exempted and as there is no question of any such exemption here, the amount of profits earned, viz. Rupees 61,304, is assessable to tax.

At the outset, we may observe that so far as the decisions of this Court are concerned, there is no conflict amongst them. The decision in 56 Mad 415,[2] followed by the Income-tax Officer, does not touch the question of the liability to assessment of the profits earned by the Fund from its share-holders nor does it in our opinion shake the authority of the decision in 47 Mad 1.[1] In that case, (56 Mad 415)[2], the question was whether the "guaranteed interest" may be deducted from the total income of the Fund during the year of account. This Court held that the guaranteed interest was interest on capital borrowed for the purpose of the fund's business within the meaning of S. 10 (2) (3), Income-tax Act, that its payment was not in any way dependent on the earning of the profits and that the fund was entitled to claim deduction in respect of that sum distributed by it as guaranteed interest. The question now referred to us did not arise for decision in that case. In 8 I T C 83[3] this Court pointed out that that case was one like 47 Mad 1.[1]

It is conceded by the learned counsel for the Commissioner that on the facts this case would fall exactly within the scope of the decision in 47 Mad 1.[1] What he wants to argue is that that case was wrongly decided and that he should be allowed to re-open the question. So far as this Court is concerned, the question has been considered and decided by the Full Bench in 47 Mad 1.[1] As pointed out in 56 Mad 415,[2] the Fund though registered under the Indian Companies Act and subject to its provisions is not really a company but a Mutual Benefit Society with a fluctuating capital. The subscriptions though called share capital are not really so, nor are they capital borrowed for the purpose of the business as that capital is ordinarily understood. In enacting the Explanation to S. 10 (2) (3), Income-tax Act, it would seem that the Legislature has shown its intention to recognize the existence of such Mutual Benefit Societies like the one in question.

1. Secretary, Board of Revenue v. Mylapore Hindu Permanent Fund Ltd., (1923) 10 A I R Mad 684=76 I C 833=47 Mad 1=45 M L J 124 (S B).

3. Sivaganga Sri Meenakshi Nidhi v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1934) 8 I T C 83.

As the law on the point has been clearly laid down in 47 Mad 1[1] and as this case falls exactly within its scope, we are not inclined now to re-open the question and to disturb the practice which has been followed since 47 Mad 1,[1] whatever view we may be inclined to take if the point was res integra. Though the term "shareholder" has been here used, we do not wish to be understood as deciding that these subscribers are share-holders properly so called within the meaning of the Companies Act. The matter is not before us. Our answer to the question accordingly is that the sum of Rs. 61,304 is, in the circumstances of the case, not liable to assessment. The assessee is entitled to Rs. 250 for costs and will get a refund of the Rs. 100 deposit.

O. P. No. 246 of 1935, Decided on 31st March 1936.

 Income-tax — Partnership—Partnership either not assessable or escaping assessment —Partners are liable—Allocation of shares is not essential.

If the partnership itself is not assessable or if it escapes assessment, then its partners are liable to assessment, although there is no allocation of shares in profits between the partners : A I R 1931 Cal 686, Rel. on ; A I R 1930 Mad 119 and 4 I T C 478, Ref. [P 60 C 1, 2]

Beasley C. J.—The question propounded is :

Whether the sum of Rs. 59,968 remitted in 1931-32 by the Saigon partnership out of its profits to the Rangoon partnership amounted to a receipt of profits pro tanto by the partners in 1931-32 so as to be assessable in their hands.

The assessee was and is a partner in a money-lending business carried on in Rangoon consisting of three partners under the vilasam of M. A. L. The same three partners are the sole partners in a similar business carried on in Saigon under the same vilasam. During the period commencing with 21st May 1931 and ending on 24th March 1932, by means of three remittances made by telegraphic transfers and by bank-drafts a sum of Rs. 59,967.8.0 was remitted by Saigon to Rangoon. It has been found as a fact that those remittances came out of profits made by the Saigon partnership. Under these circumstances, the shares of the assessee in that sum was assessed under S. 34, Income-tax Act. The contention put before the Income-tax Officer was that the partnership itself ought not to be assessed and it appears also that the Advocate who appeared before the Income-tax Officer, Rangoon, who had charge of this matter admitted that the individual partners should instead be assessed. In any case, quite apart from the admission made, the Income-tax Officer, Rangoon held, following the decision in 4 I T C 478,[1] that the contention of the assessee was correct and that the partnership was not liable to be assessed to Income-tax. The Income-tax Officer here then proceeded to assess the partners individually. The contention raised before us is that they are not liable to be so assessed; and it was strenuously argued that upon the authority of the case already referred to, this being a remittance from a separate entity, namely the Saigon partnership to another entity, namely the Rangoon partnership, the partnership was not liable to be assessed. From this Mr. K. S. Krishnaswamy Aiyengar who appeared on behalf of the assessee contended that the partners also could not be assessed though he conceded that this sum could not escape assessment but was quite unable to state upon whom the assessment was to be made other than the individual partners or the partnership. His argument was this, that this was a remittance of a lump sum of profits and until there had been an allocation amongst the partners of their shares in those profits, the individual partners could not be held to have received those profits and that until there was such an allocation, it could not be said that there was any receipt by them of the profits. He relied upon the decision of this High Court in 4 I T C 188.[2]

The answer to this contention seems to me to be this, that there was admittedly a receipt in British India of profits gained abroad. By whom were those profits received? If the contention of the assessee before the Income-tax Officer was correct, then those profits were not received by the partnership in such a way as to render the partnership itself assessable. But as those profits had been received, they must have been received by somebody. The only other alternative is, that they were received by the partners individually and there does not seem to be any other possible alternative. If the partnership itself is not assessable, clearly, in my view, the individual partners are. Although it may be true that they have not received the money into their own hands, the receipt of this money by the partnership was a receipt on behalf of the partners and if, as is contended by the assessee, the decision in 4 I T C 188[2] goes to the length of saying that until there is an allocation amongst the partners of the profits there can be no receipt, with great respect, I feel myself unable to agree with it. The deed of partnership of the Rangoon business sets out the shares to which each of the three partners is entitled and the money having been received by the partnership on behalf of the partners, it is merely a matter of arithmetic to ascertain what the share in those profits of each of the individual partners is. There is nothing in the Income-tax Act which says that a partnership or a firm is to be assessed first. Either the firm itself is liable to be assessed or its individual partners. In this case an attempt was made to assess the firm and yielding to the contention raised by the assessee, the firm was absolved from assessment and the individual partners were sought to be assessed.

I think that the Income-tax Officer was mistaken in holding that the partnership was not liable to assessment in respect of these profits as in my opinion Martin's case[1] already referred to does not touch this point at all. These profits therefore escaped assessment in the hands of the firm and it was open to the Income-tax authorities to assess the partners individually. It seems to me that if any authority for such a procedure is needed, it is to be found in the decision in 5 I T C 206.[3] In my view, the assessee was clearly assessable to Income-tax in respect of his share in the sum of Rs. 59,968. The question must therefore be answered in the affirmative. The Commissioner of Income-tax will get Rs. 250 costs.

RAMESAM AND STONE JJ.

S. K. Venkatasubramania Ayyar and others — Appellants.

S. Sivagurunatha Chettiar and others — Respondents.

Appeal No. 156 of 1926, Decided on 27th February 1935, against decree of Sub-Judge, Kumbakonam, D/- 30th September 1925.

 (a) Adverse Possession — Dates from which adverse possession of alienee starts in cases of void and voidable transfers, stated.

Adverse possession of an alienee dates from the moment the alienee is without lawful title. That time is, in the case of a void transfer, the date of the transfer; in the case of a voidable transfer, the date of the avoidance and in the case of the transfer effective for a period (whether because of estoppel or otherwise), the date of the termination of the period. [P 63 C 1]

(b) Will—Executor—Position of—Executor held trustee.

The persons named executors in a will were not merely executors but were charged with the duty of managing the property and paying the income to charity. Only the income was disposed of under the will:

Held that as only income was disposed of, and some one must have the legal estate in the corpus, and taking into consideration the duties cast upon the executors and also the possibility of having successive legal estates, the executors were in all but name trustees. [P 64 C 1]

(c) Adverse Possession—Trustee of choultry alienating choultry property as his own and not as manager—Alienation is void ab initio—Alienee's possession becomes adverse from date of alienation.

A trustee of a choultry alienated property belonging to the choultry as his own. He did not purport to pass title as manager of the choultry :

Held* that the alienation was void ab initio and possession of the alienee became adverse from the date of the alienation and not from the death of the trustee. [P 64 C 1]

 (d) Limitation — Trustee alienating property honestly believing it to be his own—Property on true construction of trust deed found to belong to cestui que trust—Time allowed by trustee to pass owing to this mistake cannot be excluded in computing limitation for suit against alienee.

If a person could extend the time for suing by alleging that he had mistaken the meaning of an instrument, a most serious inroad would be made into the law of limitation and that quieting of title which is the reason for and the policy behind the statutes of limitation would be gravely disturbed. Hence, if a trustee alienates property which he honestly believes to be his own but which on a true construction of the deed of trust belongs to the cestui que trust, time, which the trustee allows to pass owing to this mistake, counts when computing limitation for suit against alienee for possession : Case law discussed. [P 65 C 1; P 66 C 2]

Ramesam J.—The facts on which the suit (out of which this appeal arises) is based are as follows : One Kalayana Rama Ayyar of Kumbakonam established a choultry as a rest house and for feeding Brahmins and endowed certain properties for its maintenance and upkeep. It became known as Kalyana Rama Ayyar Chatram. He died in about 1855 leaving five sons. On 22nd August 1864, there was a partition between the sons by Ex. A which provided that the eldest son Sivasubramania Ayyar should conduct the charity during his lifetime and after him the other brothers in order of seniority. In the year 1871 Sivasubramania Ayyar surrendered the management of the choultry in favour of the next two brothers Venkataranga Ayyar and Suri Ayyar. The fourth son Swaminatha Ayyar died in 1881 after disposing of his property by his will dated 7th November 1881 (Ex. B). Under this will two thirds of the income of his properties were devised to his wife Chellathammal for her life, and the remaining one third was to be utilised for the purpose of feeding Brahmins in the family choultry. After the death of his widow, two thirds of the two third share given to the wife, should be utilised 'for (the) charity' and the remaining one third was to be taken by his brothers Venkataranga Ayyar and Suri Ayyar who were also appointed executors under the will. On 30th July 1882 Sivasubramania Ayyar executed a formal deed of surrender in favour of Venkataranga Ayyar. Venkataranga Ayyar managed the charity until his death in 1884. Afterwards Chellathammal died about July or August 1892. Sivasubramania Ayyar died in 1910 and the fifth brother died before 1884. Suri Ayyar was conducting the charity and carrying out the directions of Swaminatha Ayyar's will till his death on 29th December 1913. Prior to his death he executed a will on 29th June 1913. Some of the descendants of Suri Ayyar took possession of the charities. Thereupon, certain daughter's sons of Kalayana Rama Ayyar, the founder of the Chatram, instituted O. S. No. 90 of 1916 of the Sub-Court, Kumbakonam for the settlement of a scheme in respect of the Chatram. The Subordinate Judge of Kumbakonam by his judgment directed the framing of a scheme (Exs. H and H.1). There was an appeal to the High Court. The appeal was dismissed subject to some slight modification (Exs. H.2, H.3 and H.4). There was a further appeal to the Privy Council. This was disposed of in June 1924 (Ex. H.5). The decision of the Judicial Committee is reported in 47 Mad 884.[1] One of the points raised in the course of that litigation was that the gift of two thirds of two third under the will of Swaminatha Ayyar after the death of Chellathammal 'for (the) charity' was void for uncertainty. All the three Courts held in the course of that litigation that these words plainly referred to the Chatram charity which had immediately before been indicated and the gift was not void for uncertainty.

The present suit was filed on 26th April 1920 by the trustees appointed under the scheme to recover the properties which, according to the decision in the former litigation, belonged to the trust but which were in the unlawful possession of the various defendants under alienations made by Suri Ayyar. Under Ex. 1 dated 9th May 1898 Suri Ayyar sold the items described in Sch. C of the plaint to the father of defendant 5. The properties in Sch. C have been acquired by Government under the Land Acquisition Act and are now represented by a sum of Rs. 48,122-14-7 deposited in the Treasury by the receiver appointed by the Court pending litigation between defendants 5 to 13 inter se in O. S. No. 67 of 1919 on the file of the Kumbakonam Sub-Court. This alienation recognized that one third of the income of the properties was to be devoted for the Chatram, but proceeded on the footing that the whole of the remaining two third was the property of Suri Ayyar, i. e. Suri Ayyar acted on the footing that the gift under the will of Swaminatha Ayyar of two thirds of two third 'for (the) charity' was void and therefore instead of being content to claim only two-ninth of the property he claimed two third of the property. He recognized the right of the trust only to the extent of one third instead of recognizing it to the extent of seven-ninth. Defendants 5 to 13 now represent the alienees under Ex. 1. In 1910 Suri Ayyar executed another sale deed (Ex. F) in favour of defendant 4 of the properties in Sch. B. The dispute regarding these properties has been compromised in the Court below and is not before us in this appeal. By Ex. 3 dated 2nd June 1912 there was another alienation by Suri Ayyar of the properties in Sch. A in favour of defendant 1 who is an Advocate of Kumbakonam. These alienees were not parties to the former litigation and they accordingly raised the plea that the gift under Swaminatha Ayyar's will of two thirds of two third of the property was void for uncertainty and contended naturally that the judgments in the former litigation did not bind them. This was one of the points to be decided in the case. There was also a question of limitation raised by the contesting defendants. This is the other point arising in the case and is the subject of issue 11.

The Subordinate Judge found the first point in favour of the defendants. On the question of limitation he found that so far as defendant 1's alienation under Ex. 3 is concerned, it was not barred, but as to defendants 5 to 13 he held that the suit was barred by limitation even as to the one third share recognized to belong to the charity. The plaintiffs have filed this appeal. (On the question of construction of the will, his Lordship found that the construction put upon it by the Judicial Committee in the previous litigation was the proper one and held accordingly differing from the Subordinate Judge). The next question is that of limitation. On this matter I agree with my learned brother in thinking that the suit is barred by limitation so far as the property in Sch. C is concerned. (His Lordship then discussed the evidence regarding the points covered by the memorandum of objections and found in favour of the defendants-respondents.)

Stone J.—I agree. As regards the 1898 alienations (Sch. C), the question of limitation has been very strenuously argued, but I do not consider it necessary to traverse all the grounds covered. Two Articles scheduled to the Limitation Act are relied upon, the old Art. 134 and Art. 144. Art. 134 (before its recent amendment) is said not to apply because here there is no express trust. Art. 144 is said not to operate as a defence here because 1912 is the critical date for a reason that cannot be shortly stated but can be expressed as follows. It is urged that in India a variety of objects have been held to be capable of owning property. These objects, not being human, must, of necessity, have their property managed for them. Such managers are not in the position of trustees. The legal estate merely (leaving the equitable estate in the object) is not vested in the managers. The legal estate is vested in the object and the conception of an equitable estate does not arise at all. Such objects are juridical persons, as capable of holding property as a public company duly empowered. As in the case of the directors of a public company, its managers are not trustees though the relationship may well be fiduciary. Examples of such persons are idols, some temples and some mutts.

In such cases, it is further said, the manager though having no estate, legal or equitable, has power to alienate on behalf of the object. That power goes so far as to confer title upon the alienee. In some cases that title is voidable. But even where voidable, it may be good during the lifetime or period of office of the manager. If that is the position in any given case, then the alienee is not in adverse possession until the title is avoided. Until then, the title transferred is good and the alienee must be deemed to be holding under it. It follows therefore that cases may arise where, say, the alienation is in 1900; the manager alienating continues in office until 1920 and then a new manager comes on the scene and the question will arise whether the period of limitation dates from 1900 or 1920. If Art. 144 applies, then, in the case put, the adverse possession starts in 1920. Art. 134 does not apply because there is no trust.

On the other hand, if the original transfer was void, then the alienee would have been in adverse possession since the date of transfer i. e. 1900 in the case above put. The above is the effect of 44 Mad 831,[2] 12 Pat 251[3] and 46 Mad 751[4] and the cases there cited and later cases such as A I R 1935 P C 44[5] which follow the above. The 12 Pat 251[3] group is dealing with the case of a transfer that is effective up to a time; the 46 Mad 751[4] group with cases void ab initio. Both groups date the adverse possession from the moment the alienee is without lawful title. That time is, in the case of a void transfer, the date of the transfer; in the case of a voidable transfer, the date of the avoidance; in the case of a transfer effective for a period (whether because of estoppel or otherwise), the date of the termination of the period.

It will be observed that cases within the 12 Pat 251[3] group are cases where the manager or mahant is purporting to transfer on behalf of the object (mutt, temple, etc.), i. e. the juridical person. And this must be so. For the legal estate is in that person. Obviously therefore a good title could not be conveyed by the manager if the manager was not purporting to sell the land of the juridical person (owner) as manager but was purporting to sell his own land as owner. For, such a case would be a case where a man was selling what did not belong to him, and at the suit of the real owner the transaction would obviously be void. This is the kind of case considered in 46 Mad 751[4] where the transfer took the form of an execution sale under a decree obtained against the manager (or trustee) personally. It was held by the Privy Council that the alienation was void ab initio against the charity and the adverse possession accordingly dated from the transfer.

Now, despite the above manifest differences between the facts of those cases and the facts here, it is sought to apply those decisions and those principles to this case in the following way: (I). There being, it is said, no express trust contained in this will and no trustees appointed, there is here no trust. Executors as such are not express trustees: (1891) 3 Ch 119[6] at p. 124, (1899) 2 Ch 149[7] at p. 150, (1878) 3 A C 974[8] and (1905) 1 Ch 25[9] at p. 31. (II). We are therefore, it is urged, not concerned with the conception of trusts, equitable and legal estates, trustees, and cestui que trust. We are dealing with a charitable institution which under the law of India can hold as a legal personæ the legal estate. The legal institution here, it is said, is not the choultry; it is not the poor that are to be fed; it is the idea of feeding the poor at this choultry. Freed from the clinging folds of matter, form realizes the idea. One's mind goes back in imagination once more to the Academia. (III). This idea being clothed with legal personality and vested with the legal estate operates by means of human agency. The human agency is the surviving executor. (IV). The surviving executor having transferred the property not on behalf of the legal owner (the above-mentioned idea) but purporting to be the legal owner, transfers, it is said, a good title for his lifetime in the same way as a mahant of a mutt purporting to sell the mutt's property for the mutt's necessities, when in fact there is no necessity, conveys avoidable title. (V). Therefore, it is urged, possession only became adverse in 1912 when the executor died and not in 1898 when the transfer took place.

My observations on the above are that, as to (I) under the terms of this will the persons named executors were not merely executors, but were charged with the duty of managing the property and paying 1/3rd of the income to the charity and 2/3rd of the remaining 2/3rd of the income to the charity after a certain event. Bearing in mind that only income was being disposed of, and some one must have the legal estate in the corpus, bearing also in mind the duties cast upon the executors and also bearing in mind the possibility of having successive legal estates, I am of the opinion that here the executors were in all but name trustees. This is really enough to dispose of the matter, for it brings in Art. 134 (which contests both the 4/9th and 1/3rd). But assuming that I am wrong as to this, I pass to (II). I find it a little difficult to treat (II) seriously. My reason for this is not the inherent impossibility of the conception. On the contrary, there is no particular difficulty about vesting, by a fiction, some purpose or object with the qualities of a legal person. But I ask myself, how is it that in a country where the feeding of the poor has been made the object of tens of thousands of gifts inter vivos and by will, where it is widespread and benevolent idea that to feed the stranger and those in want is a pious and worthy thing to do, how is it that it has never been decided that in such cases the idea of feeding the poor, or the stranger or the place where the poor are fed are legal personæ capable, without the intervention of any trustee or any scheme of owning property? But assume that this idea is a legal person capable (III) of operating through a human agent and that agent (for no apparent reason) is the executor, still (IV) raises a fatal difficulty. This executor acting as manager of this juridical person did not alienate as manager the legal estate of the juridical person. He purported to sell (as to 4/9th) the property as being his own. It was not his own. He never purported to pass title as manager of a juridical person clothed with the legal estate. I accordingly reject the conclusion arrived at in (V) and conclude that the alienation was void ab initio, the possession was adverse in 1898 and the suit is barred.

There is, however, another point that must be mentioned. It is said that while the executor was alive there was nobody competent to sue. The answer is: The executor could have sued. Then it is said: But as the executor was the alienor he was not likely to sue even assuming he was a thoroughly honest man. He believed he had title and that belief was derived from a possible reading of an ambiguous will. If he was dishonest, he is all the less likely to sue. That of course is not really a legal but a practical objection. Even that, I think, is answered by saying that the testator's heirs (or next of kin) could and would have sued or at least would have sought the aid or permission of the Advocate-General and thereby set on foot proceedings either to remove the trustee or to set aside the transfer.

Cases such as 42 Cal 244[10] have in my opinion no bearing on this case. That case turned on the fact that where a man of low caste purports to carry on an office only capable of being conducted by a man of high caste and wrongfully receives offerings and appropriates them, then (1) he has not taken possession of the office and (2) on every occasion on which he wrongfully takes offerings he commits a new actionable wrong. 20 C W N 833[11] shows that where there is a will and an executor, though no probate, the executor's title and authority being derived from the will, the testator's rights of action vest in him and time begins to run from the death. That largely turns on S. 17 which does not apply here. We are here concerned not with the rights of the settlor but with the rights of cestui que trust.

4 M L W 369[12] was a case where X was trustee of temple A and trustee of temple B. In 1894 X died and Y was appointed trustee of temple B. No one was appointed trustee of temple A. During X's lifetime he had been in possession of the lands of temple A and temple B. When Y succeeded he in fact took possession not only of the lands of temple B but also of the lands of temple A. Trustees were eventually appointed for temple A in 1900 and in 1911 these trustees sued for possession. It was held by a Bench of this High Court that the action was not time-barred because until 1900 there was no one competent to sue and consequently possession was only adverse from 1900, i. e. adverseness of possession was made dependent upon there being a possible plaintiff This proposition is in turn founded upon 38 Mad 903.[13] That was a case involving a mortgagor, mortgagee in possession and A. A dispossessed the mortgagee in possession. The question was when did that possession become adverse to the mortgagor and it was held that it dated not from the dispossession, but from the date the mortgagor knew that the possession was adverse to his interest, for, up to that moment he would have no reason to think his rights were being invaded or that he had any cause of action to litigate.

The proposition laid down in 4 M L W 369[11] is also based on 32 Cal 129.[14] It is a little difficult to see what bearing that case has. There A, as shebait of an idol, sued. He sued after the normal period of limitation had expired, but he brought the case within the rule which relates to actions by minors for at the time the cause of action arose, he, the then shebait, was a minor and he sued within 3 years after attaining majority. It was held that even though the property be in the idol, the possession and management is in the shebait. Consequently the shebait alone has the right to sue for invasions of possessory rights and the fact that the appropriate plaintiff is a shebait does not affect the application of the section relating to minors. 4 M L W 369[12] is a very short judgment delivered in second appeal and purports to be based on the two decisions above cited. It would appear that the line of reasoning underlying that judgment is this : a temple can own but not possess. Possession is in the temple trustee : 32 Cal 129.[14] Therefore, if there is no trustee there is no one possessed of possession, no one to defend possession, no one against whom possession can be adversely held. Therefore the possession by a stranger is not adverse until trustees for the temple are appointed, for until then there is no one possessed on behalf of the temple.

However that may be, it does not touch this case where the right to sue was in the executor who at all material times was the person entitled to possession and was able to sue and knew all about the right of action, once one assumes he was aware of the true construction of the will. 2 M L W 723[15] was a case of a claim to a hereditary office and the question was whether Art. 120 or Art. 124 applied. It is discussing what is the starting point for limitation. It considers that it is "when the defendant takes possession of the office adversely to the plaintiff". Therefore if there is no "plaintiff", i. e. no one in existence capable of claiming, i. e. no trustee of the temple, there is no taking possession adversely to the plaintiff, for there is no plaintiff. That is all that case decides. At page 725 however is the following sentence :

> It is a recognized principle of law that the statute of limitation would not run when there is no person competent to sue. This is the principle underlying S. 17, Limitation Act .... This principle was acted on in England .... it being held that the cause of action could not be said to arise before "there is anybody in whom it vests".

In support of this proposition, as one depending not upon any particular section of a statute but upon a principle of procedure, there is then quoted (1821) 5 B & Ald 204=106 E R 1167.[16] In that case at p. 1171 Abbott C. J. observes :

> Now independently of authority, we think that it cannot be said that a cause of action exists, unless there be also a person in existence capable of suing.

Then turning to authority, the Lord Chief Justice refers to (1689-1712) 2 Salk 421[17], Stanford's case[18] and Fairclaim v. Little unreported but noted at p. 1171 of 106 E. R. The law of limitation is of course purely the creation of statute.

Here however there is a person capable of suing. I consider that here the real question is : If A, a trustee, alienates property he honestly believes to be his own, but which on a true construction of the deed of trust belongs to the cestui que trust, does time which the trustee allows to pass owing to this mistake, count when computing limitation ? So posed, the question appears to me to answer itself. If a person could extend the time for suing by alleging that he had mistaken the meaning of an instrument, a most serious inroad would be made into the law of limitation and that quieting of title which is the reason for and the policy behind the statutes of limitation would be gravely disturbed. But here indeed the matter hardly goes so far as that. Who is there now to say that the executor who alienated had misconstrued the will ? He may have been mistaken; he may have known all along the truth.

In any event a charity being the beneficiary, the Advocate-General could take steps and those of the family of the testator anxious to see his wishes carried out even if they could not directly sue, and as above indicated I incline to the view that they could, they could have informed the Advocate-General of the position or, what is quite clear, they could have, by appropriate proceedings with the leave of the Advocate-General, removed the executor-trustee from his trusteeship, replaced him by a new trustee which trustee could have sued. I am accordingly of the opinion that as to the 1898 alienation the defence of limitation succeeds.

Criminal Revn. Case No. 65 and Petn. No. 61 of 1937, Decided on 6th October 1937, from order of Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Devakottah, D/- 30th November 1936.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 488 and 439—High Court is loath to interfere with finding of fact in cases under S. 488—But it must interfere where awarding of maintenance to woman is not justified by definite finding that woman was legal wife.

The High Court will be very loath to interfere with a finding of fact as to whether there was a valid marriage between the parties, for the party aggrieved by the finding may always file a suit. But the High Court must interfere, if the Magistrate awards maintenance to a woman and does not justify his action by a definite finding that she is the wife of the person ordered to pay her maintenance. For, only legally married women are entitled to maintenance. [P 66 C 2; P 67 C 1]

 (b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 488 (5)—'Living in adultery' means having de facto protector with whom wife lives and is being maintained by him as his wife—But man cannot desert his wife, thus tempt her to unchastity and then resist her claim to maintenance on that ground.

The phrase 'living in adultery' means something quite different from living an unchaste life. The principle is that a husband is absolved from the obligation to maintain his wife when his wife has a de facto protector with whom she lives and by whom she is being maintained as if she were his wife. No woman can fairly claim a right to be kept by two men. But it obviously is not the law that a man may desert and neglect his wife and thus tempt her to unchastity and then resist her claim to be maintained by him on the ground that she is unchaste : A I R 1936 Rang 446, Rel. on. [P 67 C 1]

Order.—This is a petition praying that an order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Devakottai, awarding Rs. 15 as maintenance to a woman and Rs. 5 as maintenance to her daughter, be revised. The petitioner resisted the respondent's claim for maintenance on two important grounds. The chief ground was that the woman seeking to be maintained was not his lawful wife. The pleadings are not exactly explicit on the point but their meaning is quite clear. Thus, petitioner said in his statement "she was taken as wife by me 12 years ago, though there was no actual marriage." There was a great deal of evidence on both sides on this question, but the Magistrate declined to give a definite finding. He seems to have been under the impression that a woman is entitled to maintenance if she has lived with a man as his wife for 12 years and has also borne him a child. That however is certainly not the law. Only legally married women are entitled to maintenance. I must therefore send this case back to the lower Court for a definite finding after hearing both sides on the evidence already on record on the question whether there was a valid marriage between the parties. I may perhaps add that this Court will be very loath to interfere with such a finding of fact, for the party aggrieved by the finding may always file a suit. But this Court must interfere if the Magistrate awards maintenance to a woman and does not justify his action by a definite finding that she is the wife of the person ordered to pay her maintenance. For, only wives are entitled to maintenance.

The petitioner also pleaded that even if it be found that the woman is his wife, she is not entitled to maintenance because she is 'living in adultery'. The only evidence of that offered was that she was expecting a baby which could not be his and had more than one lover. Now, I understand the phrase, 'living in adultery' to mean something quite different from living an unchaste life. The principle, it seems to me, is that a husband is absolved from the obligation to maintain his wife when his wife has a de facto protector with whom she lives and by whom she is being maintained as if she were his wife. The obligation of a husband to maintain his wife arises from the anxiety of the Legislature to protect deserted wives from the bitter necessity of earning a living by trading on their sex. That obligation however ceases when it has been voluntarily assumed by some man other than the woman's husband. No woman can fairly claim a right to be kept by two men. But it obviously is not the law that a man may desert and neglect his wife and thus tempt her to unchastity and then resist her claim to be maintained by him on the ground that she is unchaste. This view of the meaning of the words 'living in adultery' receives support from A I R 1936 Rang 446.[1] The lower Court's order is set aside and the case remitted for disposal afresh on the evidence already on record in the light of the above remarks, i. e. after recording a finding on the validity of the marriage.

Appeal No. 235 of 1935, Decided on 12th October 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Nilgiris, Ootacamund, in O. S. No. 53 of 1933.

Court-fees—Refund of—Appeal settled out of Court—Court-fee cannot be refunded — Inherent powers are not to be used for doing what is prohibited by statute.

The withdrawal of an appeal as having been settled out of Court does not come within the purview of S. 13, Court-fees Act. A court-fee properly paid on such appeal cannot be refunded, even in its inherent power, because no Court has inherent power to do that which is expressly prohibited by statute: A I R 1934 Mad 566, Foll.; Case law referred. [P 67 C 2]

V. T. Rangaswami Aiyangar — for Appellants.

Venkatasubba Rao J.—The appeal has been withdrawn as having been settled out of Court and the appellant makes a somewhat unusual request that he should be allowed a refund of the court-fee paid on the memorandum of appeal. If we should have regard to what is taken to be the settled practice of this Court, this request should be summarily rejected; however, as a point of principle has been raised, we have gone into the matter carefully. Ss. 13, 14 and 15, Court-fees Act, deal with refunds of court-fee and of these, S. 13 provides for return of the fee paid on memorandum of appeal. The present case obviously does not come within the purview of that section. Then the question arises, has the Court power to direct a refund of a court-fee, independent of the express provisions of the Court-fees Act? The Courts have gone to the extent of holding that they can order a refund under their inherent powers, where an excess court-fee has been paid (i) by mistake of party and (ii) in obedience to a wrong order of Court. The principle underlying these decisions, if we may say so with respect, is both good law and sound sense. But to go further and hold that a court-fee, properly paid, can be refunded, would be to render nugatory the express provisions of the Court-fees Act, for, what difference does it make in principle between permitting a document to be filed originally without a court-fee and refunding the court-fee already paid in respect of it? It is elementary that no Court has inherent power to do that which is expressly prohibited by statute.

Second Appeal No. 1207 of 1934 and Civil Revn. Petn. No. 2059 of 1934, Decided on 8th March 1937, against decree of Sub.Judge, Cocanada, in A. S. No. 16 of 1933.

Madras Irrigation Cess Act (7 of 1865), S. 1 (1)—Riparian land—Pre-settlement inam land situated on bank of stream—Channel from stream, origin of which was unknown, irrigating portion of land—Small portion only noted as wet in inam register—Land held riparian tenement—Riparian owner held entitled to irrigate whole land without liability to pay cess.

A single block of 11 acres of a pre-settlement inam land was situated on the bank of a stream. There was a channel which took water from the stream to irrigate a portion of land. The origin of the channel was unknown, equally so the origin of the inam. It was cultivated part as wet and part as dry. The inam register mentioned a part as wet. The zamindar claimed to levy water cess on the part of the land cultivated wet in excess of the extent noted in the inam register :

Held that the grant of the land carried with it the right of a riparian owner to utilise the water of the stream for purpose of irrigation. The fact that a small extent only was noted in the inam register as entitled to free irrigation did not restrict the rights of the inamdar as the riparian owner to irrigate the whole extent as wet without liability to pay for the water used. Judgment.—The question in this case is whether the suit land is a riparian land abutting the river Yeleru and whether the plaintiff is not entitled to levy water cess for the utilisation of the water for the irrigation of the suit land. The question whether a particular land is a riparian tenement is always a question of fact depending on the circumstances of the case and upon several factors. I am satisfied upon the circumstances of this case that the suit land is a riparian tenement. The suit land is a pre settlement inam within the geographical limits of the Zamindari of Pittapur. It is a single block of land about 11 acres in extent bordered by the stream Yeleru; part of the land is dry and part of the land is wet. There is a channel, which takes water from the Yeleru river to irrigate a portion of the defendants' lands. The origin of the channel is unknown, equally so the origin of the inam. Having regard to the geographical situation of this plot, one can fairly presume that the grant of this land carried with it the right to utilise the water from the stream Yeleru and the fact that in an inam statement only 2 acres 87 cents is mentioned as wet is no criterion for restricting the user to the said extent. Reliance was placed by Mr. Raghava Rao on two English cases and on a passage in Coulson on 'Waters' and a decision of Sadasiva Ayyar J. in 34 M L J 223[1] as regards the extent of a riparian estate. It will be seen from those cases themselves that the learned Judges did not attempt to give a precise definition of what the extent of a riparian estate is. As Lawrence J. pointed out in (1926) 1 Ch 444[2] at p. 459 it depends upon a number of circumstances and all that is required is reasonable proximity to the river bank. One test laid down in Farnham and referred to by Sadasiva Ayyar J. in 34 M L J 223[1] at p. 226 is this :

> Under ordinary circumstances the individual acquires title to such an amount of land only as he can reasonably care for and cultivate by his own efforts with such paid assistants as his business ability makes it profitable for him to employ.

There is no question in this case that the suit land forms part of a single plot and also is in a single ownership. Taking this in conjunction with its geographical situation and its physical configuration, one can fairly presume on the facts of this particular case that the suit land is a riparian tenement. Though a Registrar of Co-operative Societies has no jurisdiction under S. 51 to decide a dispute between a Co-operative Society and its ex-officer, yet where a person submits to jurisdiction apparently without any protest and by his subsequent conduct acquiesces in the decision of the Deputy Registrar for a considerable period of time, the conduct of such person is such as to preclude the High Court from exercising its discretionary power in his favour. Order. — This is an application for a writ of certiorari directed to the Somavaram Co.operative Society and the Deputy Registrar of Co.operative Societies. I am invited to quash the award of the Deputy Registrar to whom a dispute between petitioner (ex.President of the Society) and the Co.operative Society had been referred on the ground that the Deputy Registrar has no jurisdiction under S. 51, Co.operative Societies Act, to decide such a dispute. The facts are briefly as follows : The petitioner as President of the Society had made loans to four persons, which were irrecoverable. Petitioner ceased to be president on 17th July 1931. Over two years later (viz. on 25th November 1933) the Co.operative Society resolved to refer the matter to the arbitration of the Registrar and claim No. 2 of 1934 was filed very early in 1934 against petitioner. For a year, this claim was pending before the Deputy Registrar, being eventually decided only on 13th March 1935 in a long judgment which dealt with the merits fully, from which it does not appear that any objection was ever taken by petitioner to the jurisdiction of the Deputy Registrar under S. 51. It is on the other hand clear that petitioner resisted the claim and fought it on the merits. After the claim had been decided in March 1935, there was more than a year's delay on petitioner's part in applying to this Court for a writ of certiorari. An ill-advised revision petition was filed in September and dismissed in November. During this interval of a year, petitioner's property was sold in execution of the Deputy Registrar's decree, the sale was confirmed and the property delivered to the auction-purchasers. The present petition was filed only on 5th May 1936.

Now it has been held in 69 M L J 726[1] that a Registrar has no jurisdiction under S. 51 of the Act to decide a dispute between a Co.operative Society and an ex-officer. This decision, if I may say so with respect, seems to me to be correct and I therefore propose to deal with this petition on the assumption that the Deputy Registrar had in fact no jurisdiction to pass a decree. It still remains to consider whether I should interfere to quash his proceedings. The facts set out above show that petitioner has not only submitted to jurisdiction, apparently without any protest, but has by his subsequent conduct acquiesced in the decision for a considerable period of time. There is no foundation for his present statement that he challenged the Deputy Registrar's jurisdiction beyond the fact that a statement to that effect occurs in his affidavit filed in support of this petition, and I do not think it would be proper to accept that as a proved fact merely because the respondents in their counter-affidavits omitted to challenge the statement. Petitioner argues that being a person aggrieved by the unwarranted usurpation of jurisdiction, he is entitled ex debito justitiae — as a matter of right—to a writ, and he relies for this proposition on (1921) 1 K B 248,[2] where a distinction is drawn between writs applied for by persons interested and writs demanded by persons aggrieved. But in that case the effect of gross delay, as in this case, by a person aggrieved in applying for a writ was not decided. The learned Lord Chief Justice concluded the judgment in that case in these words :

> On the facts there is nothing sufficiently shown to raise the point of law argued by Sir John Simon (viz. the effect of delay when the writ goes ex debito justitiae) and it is not desirable to give a decision in express terms where the point does not really arise.

But in the present case the conduct of petitioner is such as to leave no room for any doubt that for over two years after the case had been referred under S. 51 to the Deputy Registrar it never even occurred to him that this officer had no jurisdiction. He took his chance of success before that tribunal and it was not until he had failed and until the adverse decree had been executed that he elected to move this Court for a writ. My attention has been drawn to the case reported in 50 Mad 130[3] It was there pointed out by a Bench of three Judges that prima facie the English decisions establish the proposition that in such circumstances the applicant cannot obtain a writ of certiorari ex debito justitiae, but that the Court exercises a purely discretionary power. The test, it was held, is whether the applicant armed with a point either of law or of fact, which would oust the jurisdiction of the lower Court, has elected to argue the case on its merits before the Court. Judged by that test, I have no hesitation in finding that the petitioner has so conducted himself as to preclude this Court from exercising its discretionary power in his favour. The petition is therefore dismissed with costs (two sets, advocate's fee Rs. 35 each).

Canteen Contractors Syndicate Ltd., Madras — Appellants.

Corporation of Madras—Respondent.

Referred Case No. 1 of 1935, Decided on 16th September 1937, referred by the Chief Judge, Small Cause Court, Madras.

Madras City Municipalities Act (4 of 1919), S. 110 and Sch 4, Part 2, R. 7 — Company with head office at Karachi — Warehouse in Madras under manager — Manager having no discretion in fixing prices and banking all moneys received — At times sales made to public and purchases made locally — Company held transacting business within city and it could be taxed only under Proviso to R. 7.

A syndicate which was a limited liability company with head office at Karachi, had a warehouse in Madras. The depot in Madras was under the control of a manager who had no discretion with regard to prices, which were fixed by the general manager at Karachi from time to time. The money realised by the manager by sale was banked by him to the credit of the head office. But it was admitted by the manager that on occasions sales were made to the public and purchases were made locally for supply to the contractors by him and that income-tax report in respect of the costs of the business in Madras was also submitted to the head office :

Held that under these circumstances the said company was transacting business within the city for profit within the meaning of S. 110. [P 71 C 1, 2]

Held further that the warehouse in Madras could not be deemed to be a branch of the Syndicate and therefore the Company should be assessed only under the Proviso to R. 7 of Part 2 of Sch. 4. [P 71 C 2]

S. V. B. Rao — for Appellants.

A. Suryanarayaniah — for Respondent.

Burn J.—This is a reference by the learned Chief Judge of the Small Cause Court, Madras, under R. 17 of the Taxation Rules in Sch. 4, Madras City Municipal Act. The points submitted for decision are : (1) Whether the appellant Company's depot at Madras is liable to be assessed to pay companies tax under R. 7, Part 2, Sch. 4, Madras City Municipal Act; and (2) if such a tax can be levied, whether the assessment should be made under the Proviso to the above-mentioned Rule?

The appellant company is entitled "The Canteen Contractors Syndicate Ltd." It is a limited liability company registered under the Companies Act. The members of the Company are Canteen Contractors approved by the Army Department and the object with which the Company was formed was mainly the purchase overseas of all kinds of supplies required for the troops in India and the distribution of those supplies to the contractors (who also have to be approved by the Army Department). The head office of the Canteen Contractors Syndicate Ltd. is at Karachi. In Madras the Syndicate maintains a warehouse. In charge of the warehouse, there is a manager on Rs. 200 a month and he keeps six clerks who keep records of the articles received and the articles distributed. It is clear from the evidence of the manager that the members get their supplies from the warehouse, on indents which they fill in in the prescribed form. The manager of the warehouse has no discretion with regard to the prices, which are fixed by the general manager at Karachi from time to time. But the members when they take delivery of the goods from the warehouse pay for them by drawing cheques in favour of the Canteen Contractors Syndicate Ltd. and handing them to the manager of the warehouse. This, it is quite clear, is a series of transactions of sale. All the goods in the warehouse in one sense belong to the Canteen Contractors Syndicate Ltd.; but that is not of course the same thing as saying that the goods belong to the several members of the Syndicate. The members purchase the goods from the Syndicate and pay for them in the ordinary way. The advantages they get are of course derived from the purchase on a large scale by and through the head office in Karachi. The manager of the warehouse stated in his evidence that the money realised by him was banked by him to the credit of the head office. But he admitted in cross-examination that he had submitted income-tax reports to the head office in respect of the costs of the business done in Madras. He stated also that although practically the whole of the Syndicate's business is done with its own members, there are occasions on which sales are made to the public and on which purchases are made locally in the bazaar. These, according to the manager, are a very small proportion —he said 1/10th per cent.— of the whole; but nevertheless such transactions are made from time to time when there is a surplus stock or when there is a temporary deficiency. On these facts, we have no hesitation in holding that the Canteen Contractors Syndicate Ltd. is transacting business within the city for profit within the meaning of S. 110, Madras City Municipal Act. We answer the first question accordingly.

The second question is whether the Company is to be assessed to tax under the Proviso to R. 7 of the Taxation Rules in Sch. 4. As we have already observed, the head office of this Syndicate is at Karachi. It is not suggested that there is a principal office of the Syndicate in the City of Madras. The only suggestion that has been made is that there is a branch office Syndicate in Madras. From the description of his duties given by the manager of the warehouse, we are clearly of opinion that there is no branch of the Canteen Contractors Syndicate Ltd. in Madras. There is a warehouse and in the warehouse business is done for and on behalf of the Syndicate but the warehouse is not a branch of the Syndicate. The manager, as already mentioned, is under the strictest control from Karachi. He has no discretion with regard to the prices; and he has no power of disposal of the money received from the members for goods supplied to them. He is obliged to pay all such moneys immediately into the Imperial Bank to the credit of the head office. The warehouse in Madras clearly cannot be described as a branch of the Syndicate. That being so the assessment of tax on the Company must be made under the Proviso to R. 7. The second question referred to us is answered accordingly. Since the Canteen Contractors Syndicate Ltd. the assessees have failed on the first point and the Corporation has failed on the second point, we think it right to direct that each of the parties shall bear its own costs.

C.R.K./B.D. Answer accordingly.

Hindu Law —Religious endowment—Practice of archaka taking hundi collections for his own maintenance and for expenses of pooja — Legal origin of practice not known but practice long in existence and no evidence to contrary—Legal origin to practice held could be presumed.

The presumption of a legal origin is a rule of convenience, for, if there were no such presump-

It is proper to apply this rule provided that the presumption of legal origin is practicable and reasonably capable of being presumed without doing violence to the probabilities of the case: A I R 1922 P C 163 and A I R 1930 P C 103, Foll.

Judgment. — The question argued in this appeal is whether the practice that the archaka should take the whole of the hundi collections for his own maintenance expenses and for the expenses of the pooja is an illegal practice opposed to public policy. The first Court, on the authority in 40 Mad 212,[1] thought it was; but the Appellate Court has thought that the more recent case, 68 M L J 295,[2] shows that appropriation by archakas of a fixed portion of the hundi collections is not necessarily an illegal practice.

Mr. Somayya has taken me through 40 Mad 212[1] at some length to try to satisfy me that the facts of that case fully resemble those in the present case; but it would appear that in 40 Mad 212[1] the archakas at no time claimed a right to appropriate the hundi collections except on the ground that such an appropriation was necessary for the maintenance and proper performance of the ceremonies connected with the temple. It also appears in that case that the Government, apparently then representing the temple, interfered from time to time with the appropriation of the collections by the archakas and only allowed them to enjoy it because they were satisfied that it was necessary in the interests of the proper performance of the ceremonies of the temple. The agreement which subsequently came up for consideration in that case was one entered into between the trustees and the archakas, whereby the archakas were to appropriate the collections and give to the temple the sum of Rs. 300. It was held that the trustees had no authority to make a permanent arrangement of this kind and that it was a breach of trust to do so. In 68 M L J 295[2] there was also a practice whereby the archakas appropriated a fraction of the hundi collections, and out of that sum they had to maintain themselves and perform certain poojas and other ceremonies. Varadachariar J. held that such a practice was not repugnant to Hindu ideas and that when the origin of the practice was unknown, it must be assumed to be a legal one. The presumption of a legal origin is a rule of convenience ; for, if there were no such presumption, it would be impossible in many cases to decide what the rights of parties were. Their Lordships of the Privy Council, in considering this matter in 46 Bom 481[3] and 57 Cal 1293,[4] recognized the propriety of applying this rule, provided that the presumption of legal origin was practicable and reasonably capable of being presumed without doing violence to the probabilities of the case. In the case before us, nothing is known of the origin of this practice, and no evidence exists of any agreement entered into between the trustees and the archakas permitting the archakas to appropriate this money. All that we know is that the practice has been in existence as long as witnesses can remember—and no instance has been given of any occasion on which the archakas have not appropriated this money. It cannot be said that the presumption of a legal origin to the practice is unreasonable and against the probabilities arising from the evidence. The lower Appellate Court was therefore justified in presuming a legal origin.

It may be mentioned, although the matter is not of any great importance, that the archaka does not claim everything that is put in the hundi ; but only the cash. Certain saffron coloured pieces of cloth with coins tied in them, etc., and gold and silver articles are also placed in the hundi ; and the archaka does not deny that this property belongs to the temple. There is only one exhibit in the case that has any bearing on the case, and that is Ex. K. It bears the date 10th December 1909 and purports to be a patti signed by one Balaji Rao, presumably the manager of the temple for that year, setting out the expenses incurred for the payment of servants for the necessary services of the temple. In accordance with that patti, the Government made a grant of Rs. 81.11.2; but it does not appear that it was expected that the money should be spent in precisely the manner set out in Ex. K. Ex. K purports to be rather an estimate of the expenses that had been met by the state before the British Government assumed power or, at any rate, the expenses of the temple which the present Government felt it their duty to meet. Ex. K shows that the maintenance of the archaka was estimated at Rs. 17.12.5, and certain other sums were allowed for the performance of the daily pooja and so on. Presumably, the claim of the archaka is that he should be entitled to whatever sum is placed in the hundi, subject to the minimum of this sum granted by the Government in accordance with this patti. I do not think there is anything in this patti which would limit the right of the archaka to Rs. 17.12.5 remuneration; and in fact Mr. Somayya has fairly conceded that if the archaka is not entitled to the hundi collections, further relief would have to be granted to him. I therefore agree with the lower Appellate Court and dismiss this appeal with costs.

Second Appeal No. 349 of 1933, Decided on 9th September 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Vizagapatam, in A. S. No. 6 of 1931.

Limitation Act (1908), Art. 139—Suit by landlord to recover possession from tenant—Tenant proving determination of tenancy—Landlord alleging continuation of tenancy must prove it.

Article 139 bars a suit by the landlord to recover possession of the leased property from the tenant after the expiration of 12 years from the date when the tenancy was terminated. Where the question of limitation is involved, the burden is on the tenant to prove when the tenancy was determined. [P 74 C 1, 2]

Where the defendant continued in possession of the leased property for more than 12 years even after the expiry of the tenancy and it was not proved that he paid rent or that the plaintiff, the landlord, assented to the possession of the defendant after the period of the lease or that the defendant had accepted the title of the landlord :

Judgment.—It has been proved to the satisfaction of the Courts below that the contesting defendants 3 to 5 executed a lease deed Ex. A in favour of the plaintiff's father in 1906 for a period of three years. There is also abundant evidence that the defendants have been in possession since then up to the date of suit; and there is no evidence to suggest that the defendants were ever out of possession. There is also no evidence that the defendants ever paid any rent either to the appellant or to the plaintiff's father and his brothers. The trial Court found on these facts that as it must be presumed that defendants 3 to 5 continued in possession as tenants of the plaintiff, the possession remained with the plaintiff, at any rate until 1923, when the plaintiff brought a suit on a lease deed which was found to be not genuine. It therefore decreed the suit in the plaintiff's favour. In appeal it was held that the plaintiff had not been in possession within twelve years and that the suit had therefore to fail. Unfortunately the question whether the possession of the defendants was a possession by virtue of the relationship of landlord and tenant existing between them was not properly discussed by the lower Appellate Court and so this second appeal has been filed against the decree of the lower Appellate Court dismissing the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff has brought this suit on his title, and ordinarily he would have to prove possession within twelve years of suit. Admittedly he has not proved physical possession and the only question that arises here is whether he was in possession within twelve years of suit by virtue of the relationship of landlord and tenant existing between the plaintiff and defendants 3 to 5. It is argued that the fact that the defendants continued in possession of the property after the expiry of the lease Ex. A shows that they must have continued as tenants holding over, that the burden is upon the defendants to show when that tenancy was determined, and that a suit brought within twelve years of the determination of the tenancy would have to be decreed.

It is contended that the defendants are estopped from denying the title of the plaintiff as they have never given up possession to the plaintiff. S. 116, Evidence Act, does not go so far as to require that. That section only estops a tenant from disputing his landlord's title during the continuance of the tenancy. It has however been held in two cases, 32 C W N 367[1] and 24 C L J 103,[2] that estoppel continues even after the expiration of the period of the lease, unless the tenant has openly surrendered possession or has at least given notice to his landlord that he claims under his own title. There is no evidence in this case either to show that the tenant did deny the landlord's title soon after 1909 or that he did not; but Art. 139, Lim. Act, bars any suit to recover possession from the tenant after the expiration of twelve years from the date when the tenancy is determined. This has been laid down by Venkatasubba Rao J. in 48 M L J 185,[3] following older cases; but the argument of the learned counsel for the appellant is that it must be presumed that defendants 3 to 5 continued as tenants even after 1909. I can find no reason why I should presume this. There is no evidence that the defendants paid rent, nor is there any evidence that the plaintiff assented to the possession of the defendants after 1909 or that the defendants accepted the title of the landlord. Undoubtedly, if there had been any evidence at all that at any time after 1909 the defendants 3 to 5 had paid rent to the plaintiff's father or to the plaintiff or to defendants 1 and 2, then there would be positive evidence that in the year in which that rent was paid the relationship of landlord and tenant existed, and then the burden would be on defendants 3 to 5 to prove when that relationship ceased; but where there is no evidence at all that rent was at any time paid, there is no reason at all to believe that there was any relationship of landlord and tenant after 1909. Where a question of limitation is involved, the burden is on the defendants to prove when the tenancy was determined; but they have done so in this case by reference to Ex. A itself, which shows that the tenancy that the plaintiff relied on ceased in 1909. If any tenancy arose after 1909, the plaintiff would have to prove it. If they could do so, then the defendants will have to prove when that tenancy was determined.

The learned Advocate for the appellant, while conceding that the plaintiff has to prove a tenancy, either by evidence or by implication of law, complains that the plaintiff was not afforded an opportunity of letting in the necessary evidence, as no issue was framed in the trial Court regarding the date on which the tenancy was determined; and the Appellate Court gave that matter no consideration at all. This is due to the fact that the plaintiff's case in the trial Court differed from the case argued here in second appeal. The plaintiff did not say in his plaint that the defendants, after the expiry of the lease in 1909, were holding over from year to year; but on the contrary that the defendants had executed leases from time to time in favour of the plaintiff's father and his successors and were paying rent on those leases. That case the plaintiff failed to prove; and he did not assert in his plaint that the relationship between the plaintiff's father and the defendants was that of landlord and tenant holding over after the expiration of the lease. I cannot see therefore that the plaintiff has any cause for complaint with regard to the issues framed in the trial Court. The second appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs. Leave to appeal is refused.

V. Viyanna — for Petitioner.

Leach C. J.—The question raised by this petition is whether an improperly stamped promissory note can be admitted in evidence to prove acknowledgment of liability in order to save limitation in respect of promissory notes previously executed. The petition arises out of a suit filed in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Amalapuram. The promissory note was in the following terms :

On account of my necessity this day, that is, the amount due for principal and interest on the promissory note executed and delivered on 23rd June 1929 is Rs. 93-3-0 ; the amount due on the promissory note executed and delivered on 6th July 1929 is Rs. 92-13-0 and the amount due for principal and interest on the promissory note executed and delivered on 14th February 1931 is Rs. 101. The total is Rs. 287. On demand I promise to pay you or order in one lump sum the (said) principal together with interest thereon at Re. 1-9-0 (one rupee and nine annas) per cent. per mensem, shall get the payment endorsed on this note and take it back. The consideration hereof has been received as aforesaid. This promissory note is executed with consent.

On a stamp of the value of one anna was appended the signature of the executant. The learned Judge before whom the case came refused to admit this document on the ground that its admission was prohibited by S. 35, Stamp Act 1899. The learned advocate for the petitioner contends that this decision is wrong. He says that the learned Judge should have admitted that portion of the document which recited the previous promissory notes, and that this would have saved limitation in respect of the earlier instruments. The relevant portion of S. 35 reads as follows :

No instrument chargeable with duty shall be admitted in evidence for any purpose by any person having by law or consent of parties authority to receive evidence or shall be acted upon, registered or authenticated by any such person or by any public officer unless such instrument is duly stamped.

It will be observed that the instrument shall not be admitted in evidence for any purpose, nor shall it be acted upon, unless it bears the stamp prescribed by law. I should have thought that on the wording of this section it was clear that the promissory note in suit could not be admitted in evidence for the purpose sought by the petitioner or for any other purpose. But the petitioner's counsel has quoted two cases decided by Pandalai J. which support his contention. He also relies on a passage from the work of the late Sir Dinshah Mulla on the Indian Stamp Act. Before referring to these authorities, I would point out that the words 'for any purpose' did not appear in the General Stamp Act 1869, but were inserted for the first time in the Indian Stamp Act 1879, and that they were not introduced into the English Act until the year 1891 (54 and 55 Vict., Ch. 39). In 1849 the question of the admissibility of an improperly stamped document for collateral purposes was discussed by the House of Lords in (1849) 2 H L 286.[1] It was there held that where a paper purported to be a receipt, and, as such, required a stamp, but also purported to be an agreed statement of accounts, which did not require a stamp, it might be given in evidence to show the agreed state of accounts only, though it had not been previously stamped. But it has since been accepted that the amendment in the English Act in 1891 has worked a change.

In A I R 1930 Mad 485,[2] Pandalai J. held that where a promissory note contained, in addition to the promise, a statement that the amount for which it was given was due in settlement of a previous account, the instrument, although inadmissible as a promissory note for want of sufficient stamp, was admissible to prove an acknowledgment under S. 19, Lim. Act. The reason given was that S. 35, Stamp Act, merely shuts out the portion of the document which constitutes the promissory note and does not affect other statements in the document. The learned Judge expressed the same opinion in a later case, A I R 1933 Mad 251,[3] but it did not find acceptance by Beasley C. J. in the recent case in (1937) 1 M L J 163.[4] The learned Chief Justice there held that an insufficiently stamped promissory note could not be used for the purpose of proving an acknowledgment by the maker of it of his indebtedness. This was also a case in which it was sought to save limitation by the admission of the instrument in evidence. In the course of his judgment, Beasley C. J. referred to the unreported case in S. A. No. 124 of 1930,[5] where he and King J. sitting as a Bench, dissented from the opinion of Pandalai J. The learned advocate for the petitioner has not referred us to any other decided cases which support the proposition which he has advanced, but has laid stress on a passage to be found at p. 122 of Edn. 3 of Sir Dinshah Mulla's work. The conclusion arrived at by the author of that work is to the effect that an instrument not duly stamped may be admissible as proof of a collateral matter, but is not admissible as proof for a collateral purpose. By 'collateral matter' is meant any matter the proof of which does not depend upon proof of the transaction, and by 'collateral purpose' any matter the proof of which depends upon proof of the transaction. With great respect I consider that this statement conflicts with the wording of the section, which is very precise. Sir Dinshah Mulla would appear to go back to the case in (1849) 2 H L 286,[1] which was decided before the words 'for any purpose' were introduced into the statute. That the English law since the passing of the Act of 1891 is not the same as it was when (1849) 2 H L 286[1] was decided is to be gathered from the decision of President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (Sir Samuel Evans) and Bargrave Deane J. in (1914) P 274,[6] where it was held that the effect of the Stamp Act of 1891 is that an unstamped document, which requires a stamp, cannot be received in evidence, except in criminal proceedings, for any purpose whatever, including a collateral purpose. Sir Samuel Evans in his judgment remarked that whatever the law was before 1891, he was of opinion that the instrument with which the Court was then concerned was not admissible. As I have already pointed out, the English Stamp Act of 1891 is the same as the present Indian Stamp Act in this respect.

The Bombay High Court in 21 Bom 201[7] held that an acknowledgment of a debt coming under Art. 1, Sch. 1, Stamp Act 1 of 1879, could not if unstamped be given in evidence for any purpose including the purpose of saving limitation.

There have been similar decisions by other High Courts, but it is not necessary to examine them in detail. The section itself, in my opinion, provides a complete answer to the petitioner's case. If an unstamped document cannot be admitted for any purpose, it must mean, if the words are to be given their ordinary and plain meaning, that it cannot be admitted under any circumstances in a civil suit. If the Legislature in placing this provision of law on the statute book had intended to allow unstamped instruments to be admitted for collateral purposes, it would surely have said so. It did not say so, but on the other hand it provided that a negotiable instrument which is insufficiently stamped at the time of execution cannot be properly stamped afterwards, even on payment of a penalty which is allowed in the case of other documents. For these reasons the petition must be dismissed.

Appeal No. 1 of 1936, Decided on 19th August 1937, against decree of City Civil Court, Madras, D/-22nd November 1935.

Banker and customer—Bank rule providing closure of depositor's account without reference—Rule held legal and valid.

A rule of a Bank that it could close the account of any depositor without any reference to him, in case it thought undesirable to keep such account open for any reason whatsoever, is not prohibited by law nor is it immoral nor against public policy ; it is merely one of the terms of a contract between the depositor and the Bank. [P 77 C 2 ; P 78 C 1]

M. Chelva Iyengar and P. G. Raghavendra Rao — for Appellants.

Dr. V. K. John and C. M. Kuruvilla — for Respondents.

Leach C. J. — The appellant was the plaintiff in a suit filed in the City Civil Court for the recovery of damages for the dishonouring of a cheque. The respondent is a Bank carrying on business in Mount Road, Madras. In September 1932 the appellant opened an account with the Bank. The Bank had rules regarding the keeping of accounts and one of the rules reads as follows :

> The Bank reserves to itself the right to close any account without reference to the depositor if in the opinion of the Bank it is not desirable to keep such account for any reason whatsoever.

This was one of the conditions on which the plaintiff's account was opened and it formed part of the contract between him and the Bank with reference to his account. There was a further rule to the effect that a depositor should always have a minimum credit balance of Rs. 100. On 1st August 1934 when his account was standing in credit to the extent of Rupees 15.4.7, the appellant drew a cheque in favour of one C. R. Parthasarathi Mudaliar for Rs. 12, but the Bank closed the account that day. The cheque was presented for payment on 3rd August when payment was refused on the ground that the account had been closed since the cheque had been drawn, the cheque being returned with an endorsement on a separate slip bearing the words "account since closed". When closing the account on 1st August, the Bank wrote to the plaintiff informing him of the fact and sent him pay warrants for Rs. 15.4.7 and Rs. 3.11.1, the latter sum representing interest which the Bank admitted had accrued due to the plaintiff in respect of his account. This letter was received by the plaintiff on 3rd August, and on that date he wrote to the Bank stating that he had drawn a cheque for Rs. 12 on 1st August. He accordingly returned the warrant for Rs. 15.4.7 to meet this cheque. He kept the warrant for Rs. 3.11.1 against a larger claim for interest. He alleged that the Bank was indebted to him for interest in the sum of Rs. 10 and had in fact already filed a suit to recover this amount. The relations between the parties therefore were not on an amicable basis when the account was closed by the Bank, but this does not affect the question at issue. The learned Judge found that there was no cause of action and in disposing of the claim observed :

> It is argued that such a rule (that is the rule giving the Bank the right to close an account without reference to the depositor) is invalid because it is opposed to the ordinary code of banking business. But so long as it is not in violation of a statutory obligation, I do not see why parties should not contract themselves in the manner they have chosen to do. The rule is in the nature of a contract entered into between the parties. It cannot be said that there is a statutory prohibition. Neither can it be said that it is immoral or that it is opposed to public policy. Under the circumstances I am of opinion that plaintiffs were not entitled to be given notice before the account was closed.

We are in entire agreement with these remarks. The rule is worded without any ambiguity. It gives the Bank the right to close the account at any time without giving the plaintiff notice of the fact. I might add that in returning the cheque the Bank was careful to point out that the account had been closed after the drawing of the cheque. Therefore there was no reflection on the plaintiff, not that this would make any difference to the plaintiff's position, but it does provide another ground for holding that the plaintiff has brought this action without any justification. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—The question in this second appeal is whether S. 47, Civil P. C., operates as a bar to the maintenance of the suit instituted by the plaintiff for a declaration that the transfer of a decree obtained by defendant 1 against him in favour of defendant 2 is invalid. Both the lower Courts took the view that it does not. This view is canvassed in second appeal. The question is whether it is sound. The material facts bearing on the question are these : Defendant 1, Rednam Sitaramiah obtained a decree in S. C. S. No. 208 of 1926 on the file of the District Munsif's Court of Amalapuram on 9th August 1926 against the plaintiff Potula Venkataramayya and another. Defendant 2 obtained a transfer of the said decree on 17th February 1927, under Ex. 3-A, and as the transfer deed was defective, a later transfer was effected on 12th March 1927, under Ex. C. In pursuance of that transfer defendant 2 applied on 22nd March 1927 for leave to execute the decree under O. 21, R. 16, Civil P. C. The judgment-debtors oppose the application for execution. Their grounds of objection are these. On 22nd July 1926, one Pundareekashadu obtained a decree in S. C. S. No. 29 of 1926 on the file of the Sub-Court, Bezwada, against Rednam Sitaramayya, the decree-holder in S. C. S. No. 208 of 1926, the assignor of defendant 2. On 3rd February 1927, the said Pundareekashadu assigned the decree to Potula Venkataramayya, the present plaintiff, i. e. one of the judgment-debtors in S. C. S. No. 208 of 1926. In pursuance of the transfer he applied for leave to execute the said decree in S. C. S. No. 29 of 1926, got a transfer of the said decree to the District Munsif's Court of Amalapuram and attached the decree in S. C. S. No. 208 of 1926. Both the judgment-debtors in S. C. S. No. 208 of 1926 alleged that the transfer of the said decree in favour of defendant 2 was nominal and collusive and without consideration and was brought about to defraud the rights of Potula Venkataramayya under the decree in S. C. S. No. 29 of 1926.

Two questions were raised, namely whether the transfer in favour of defendant 2 was collusive and bears no consideration and whether he was only a name lender for the decree-holder Sitaramayya. The learned Subordinate Judge of Amalapuram overruled the objections of the judgment-debtors and upheld the transfer by his order dated 14th March 1928. Thereupon Potula Venkataramayya instituted the present suit against Rednam Sitaramayya, the decree-holder in S. C. S. No. 208 of 1926 and Chintalapudi Venkataramayya, defendant 2, in whose favour the assignment of the said decree has been effected, for a declaration that the transfer was a sham and collusive transaction brought about in fraud of his rights and therefore invalid. The question therefore on these facts is whether such a suit is maintainable. The grounds on which the lower Court decided the case are two, namely: (1) that the objection raised by the plaintiff to the transfer before the Sub-Court, Amalapuram, in proceedings under O. 21, R. 16, Civil P. C., was not in the capacity of the judgment-debtor and therefore S. 47, Civil P. C., would not apply; and (2) the matter decided by the executing Court was not one relating to execution because it relates to the factum and the validity of the assignment. The relevant provisions of the Civil Procedure Code bearing on the matter are O. 21, R. 16 and S. 47 (3). O. 21, R. 16 provides that "Where a decree has been transferred by assignment in writing", which is the case here, > the transferee may apply for execution of the decree to the Court which passed it and the decree may be executed in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as if the application was made by the decree-holder.

Where therefore such an application for execution is made by a transferee, it is open to the judgment-debtor to say that he is not a representative of the decree-holder on the ground that there is no valid transfer and no vesting of the decree in him by virtue thereof. Under S. 47, sub-r. (3), where a question arises as to whether any person is or is not the representative of a party, such a question which involves the validity of the transfer shall be determined by the Court. Unless that is done, the Court could not pass an order for execution. The validity of the transfer may be questioned on various grounds. Prima facie therefore the objections raised by the judgment-debtors to the application for execution of the decree made by defendant 2 under O. 21, R. 16 are questions which it was obligatory upon the Court before which such an application was made to decide. The objections having been determined, and the order for execution having been made by recognizing the transfer, it is a decree within the meaning of S. 47, Civil P. C. A separate suit will not lie and S. 47 appears to be a bar to the suit. Considerable reliance is placed by the lower Court and by Mr. Raghava Rao before me on two cases in favour of the view that a suit like the one in question is not prohibited by S. 47, Civil P. C. One case is 26 Mad 264,[1] and the other is A I R 1929 Lah 51,[2] which purports to follow 26 Mad 264.[1] In 26 Mad 264[1] it was held that a suit by an assignee of a decree for a declaration that he obtained a valid assignment of the decree might be brought and when such a suit is brought, the Court should simply decide as to the factum and validity of the assignment and should not declare that the assignee is entitled to execute the decree. It may be noticed that when the above decision was passed, the relevant provision of S. 244, corresponding to S. 47, Civil P. C., bearing on the present discussion, ran thus :

> If a question arises as to who is the representative of a party for the purposes of this section, the Court may (either stay execution of the decree until the question has been determined by a separate suit or) itself determine the question (by an order under this section).

It will thus be seen that a separate suit was not prohibited by S. 47, Civil P. C. In the particular case, in 26 Mad 264,[1] the transfer was not recognized and the result of the said order was that the assignee was not treated as the representative of the decree-holder. It may well be said in such cases there could be no decree and therefore no appeal. It does not decide whether a suit will lie if in fact an order for transfer is made and the assignee is treated as the representative. It seems to me therefore that, apart from the fact that 26 Mad 264[1] was decided before the passing of the new Civil Procedure Code, it will not be applicable to cases like the present. The language of the present Code is different. It is rendered obligatory on the Court to decide the question, i. e. the validity of the transfer and an order determining it will, for the purpose of the section, amount to a decree. A I R 1929 Lah 51[2] merely purports to follow 26 Mad 264.[1] But Mr. Raghava Rao relied upon the following observation therein :

> Besides, there is the practical inconvenience of entering upon an inquiry as to whether or not the assignment in favour of Salig Ram was genuine and for consideration or was intended to defeat the creditors of the assignors. It can hardly be said that this inquiry comes strictly within the purview of S. 47, Civil P. C.

There is no discussion by the learned Judges of sub-r. 3 of S. 47, Civil P. C. It is not even noticed. I am not able to understand what the practical inconvenience the learned Judges envisage by entering upon an inquiry contemplated. The Rule provides that the question whether a person is or is not the representative for the purpose shall be decided by the Court and when the statute imposes an obligation to determine the said question, which as I have already pointed out involves of necessity all questions relating to the validity of the transfer, I do not see how any question of inconvenience is a matter of consideration at all. With great respect to the learned Judges who decided that case, I am unable to follow their view.

1. Bommanapati Veerappa v. Chintakunta Srinivasa Rau, (1903) 26 Mad 264.
2. Ishar Das Gorakh Ram v. Salig Ram, (1929) 16 A I R Lah 51=117 I C 893.

The next point raised by Mr. Raghava Rao is that the objection raised by the present plaintiff was not in the capacity of a judgment-debtor and therefore the present suit is not barred by S. 47. He outlined his argument thus. The present plaintiff occupied the position of attaching creditor of the decree in S. C. S. No. 208 of 1926 by virtue of the attachment effected in execution of the decree in S. C. S. No. 29 of 1926. Therefore according to him, the main question was whether defendant 2 was entitled to execute the decree or the present plaintiff as attaching creditor was entitled to execute decree and therefore not being a question between the parties or their representatives, but in effect between rival decree-holders, S. 47 cannot be a bar. I may at once say that a recent decision of the Madras High Court reported in 57 Mad 457 [3] is against this view. There is also authority for the other view: vide 24 M L W 70[4] and A I R 1927 Mad 1025[5] and other decisions noticed therein. It seems to me unnecessary to decide between this conflict and express my opinion as to whether 57 Mad 457[3] is right or wrong. In my opinion the plaintiff, when he put forward his objections, cannot be deemed to have urged them in a capacity different from the capacity of the judgment-debtor which he occupied in the suit. His objection is that the transfer in favour of defendant 2 is a nominal and collusive transaction and therefore the property in the decree did not vest in defendant 2. Mr. Raghava Rao concedes that this is an objection which the plaintiff qua judgment-debtor can legitimately raise and could be decided by the Court. But what he contends is the other objection that the transfer was executed with a view to defraud his rights as the transferee of the decree in S. C. S. No 29 of 1926 can only be in the capacity of the decree-holder in S. C. S. No. 29 of 1926 and not in the capacity of the judgment-debtor in S. C. S. No. 208 of 1926.

I am unable to agree with this view. As judgment-debtor, it was legitimately open to him to say that the transfer could not avail against him because by virtue of the transfer of the decree and by virtue of the attachment he had certain rights which he can assert against his assignor which he had been deprived of by virtue of the fraudulent transfer. For example, to the extent of the amount of the decree in S. C. S. No. 29 of 1926, satisfaction has to be entered up and for the balance only execution can be had: cf. A I R 1934 Cal 465.[6] The question of satisfaction of the decree is one which can be raised. It is unnecessary to decide what the effect of that contention may be, but it is certainly a contention which it is open to him to raise and arises by virtue of his occupying the position of the judgment-debtor. Therefore the substantial objection from which certain rights will flow in the present case is the objection that the assignment is a sham and collusive transaction and that being a question which is legitimately open to him qua judgment-debtor, it was raised and adjudicated by the Court by an order dated 14th March 1928, and it is therefore not open to him to agitate it again by a separate suit. I therefore overrule the objections of Mr. Raghava Rao and set aside the decrees of both the lower Courts and dismiss the suit with costs throughout. Leave to appeal granted.

Dhanakoti Ammal — Defendant.

Civil Suit No. 410 of 1933, Decided on 6th October 1936.

(a) Contract—Construction — Preliminary contract reduced into deed—In case of difference, deed governs preliminary contract.

When a preliminary contract (though in writing) is afterwards reduced into a formal deed and there is any difference between them, the preliminary written contract is entirely governed by the deed: (1880) 15 Ch D 306, Rel. on. [P 82 C 1]

(b) Vendor and Purchaser — Vendee fully conversant with boundaries and extent of land, purchasing it — Sale deed describing land accurately by boundaries and stating it to be 'about 99 grounds'—Land measuring only 85 grounds after sale—Suit for compensation for deficiency — Principle of S. 15, Specific Relief Act held applied — Question of exact area held was immaterial and vendee could not succeed.

A vendee of certain land was fully conversant with all information concerning the property purchased. The sale deed stated that the land measured 'about 99 grounds' and the land was fully and accurately described by the boundaries. The vendee knew exactly what he was buying. The land was surveyed after the sale deed and it measured 85 grounds. The vendee brought a suit for compensation by way of damages on the ground that the vendor had agreed to sell 99 grounds while in fact he actually conveyed 85 grounds :

Held that though the suit was not for specific performance, the principle of S. 15 applied as the deficiency was a considerable portion. Moreover the vendee being thoroughly conversant with the boundaries and the extent of the land which was accurately described by metes and bounds in the deed, the question of the exact area of the land was immaterial for the sale. The sale deed gave no warranty that land was 99 grounds and the vendee therefore could not get damages : (1883) 11 Q B D 255; (1812) 1 V & B 375 ; (1843) 11 M & W 188 and A I R 1920 Bom 164, Ref. [P 85 C 1, 2]

Judgment.—Prior to the year 1931 the defendant was the owner of a piece of land in Madras which was known as the Koyyatope garden. It was about 4 3/4 cawnies in extent that is to say, about 114 grounds. Plaintiff 2, who throughout in matters referable to this suit has acted on behalf of himself and on behalf of plaintiff 1, knew of this land and I am satisfied was well conversant with every detail of it. In the year 1931 some 14 3/4 grounds or thereabouts were sold by the defendant of which 6 grounds were purchased by plaintiff 2 alone by a sale deed of 29th October 1931. In the early part of 1932 the defendant was anxious to raise money upon the balance of the Koyyatope garden either by selling it or by raising money upon mortgage in respect of it; and plaintiff 2 was offering to the defendant his assistance to try to further the defendant's objects in regard to this land. He was asked in cross-examination whether he was helping the defendant to sell the land, he stoutly denied it but admitted that a letter dated 15th April 1932, Ex. 2, was his letter ; and from that it is quite clear that he was doing what I have already indicated in my view he was, and this letter shows that he was well conversant with all matters concerning this property. It would also appear from this letter that it was in contemplation that it would be divided into sites as land was more easily saleable in that way than by larger areas. Sometime at about the period of this letter, Ex. 2, a notice, Ex. A, came into existence which was printed and the defendant's name appears at the foot of it, and para. 1 draws the attention of the public to the balance of the Koyyatope garden which was to be sold and it says that there was remaining to be dealt with 99 grounds. It was suggested that plaintiff 2 either assisted in the drafting or himself drafted this document for the defendant's use. He on the other hand says that he relied upon its contents when he was contemplating himself buying this land later in the year. Whether he did draft it himself I do not know, but I am perfectly satisfied that he placed no reliance in any way upon its contents when he himself was considering purchasing the land. It would seem that his efforts on behalf of the defendant to find either a purchaser or a mortgagee were unsuccessful. But on 25th July 1932, the defendant in fact mortgaged this property for a sum of Rs. 9,000, no doubt being in immediate need of money at that time, and it does not appear that plaintiff 2 brought about this mortgage or that he had the remuneration he hoped to earn which is indicated in his letter, Ex. 2. However, in November 1932 the defendant and plaintiff 2 on behalf of himself and his co-plaintiff were negotiating for the sale of the remaining land at the Koyyatope garden ; and as a result of these negotiations the sale deed, Ex. F dated 11th November 1932, was executed by the parties. There was an antecedent document, Ex. B of 10th November 1932 which dealt with this piece of property and oral evidence has been tendered in regard to the price of the land sold and how that price was computed. In the sale deed the price expressed to be paid for this land is Rs. 17,500 and any oral evidence tending to contradict that, in my opinion, is entirely inadmissible. In like manner also is the document Ex. B. Fry L. J. referred to (1880) 15 Ch D 306[1] in (1884) 13 Q B D 351[2] at page 359 and says :

> When a preliminary contract is afterwards reduced into a deed and there is any difference between them, the mere written contract is entirely governed by the deed.

Therefore, so far as the price is concerned, one is confined to the wording of the deed, Ex. F. As I have said, I am quite satisfied that plaintiff 2 was fully conversant with all information concerning the property, the subject of the sale deed. He had bought a few grounds from the whole of the garden, he had visited it on numerous occasions and when he was negotiating and eventually agreed to buy the property, he knew perfectly well exactly what he was buying. The claim by the plaintiffs here is that the defendant agreed to sell to them 99 grounds of land, that she has in fact conveyed only 85 grounds 85 square feet and they have obtained 14 grounds less than they bargained to buy and that they should be compensated for this loss by way of damages for the breach of the covenant contained in the sale deed. There is also a claim in the plaint for some Rs. 350 by way of further damages, but there has been no evidence tendered upon that and indeed no reference has been made to that part of the claim. Plaintiff 2's story is this, that prior to this sale he was informed by the defendant that of the land to be sold, 9 grounds had already been allocated towards the making of a roadway through the property and therefore the actual land which he was buying for effective use, that is to say, in this case to divide into plots to re-sell, was 90 grounds and he based his price at so much a ground upon those 90 grounds. He says the price was Rs. 200, namely, Rs. 18,000 in all. That is not the price mentioned in Ex. B nor is it the price mentioned in the sale deed, Ex. F.

It was never suggested that before this sale this land was laid out or mapped out in plots and the plaintiffs have called a Mr. Doraiswami Pillai, P. W. 2, who is a surveyor employed by the Madras and Southern Maharatta Railway Company, who was called in to survey the land by plaintiff 2 after the purchase and he said in the course of his evidence that he made a plan, Ex. G, in which the plots are marked out and numbered in order to help the plaintiff to sell the land by plots, in other words, he surveyed it, marked out on the plan the division of the land in plots and also indicated a roadway through this property. He said he found in the area, the subject of Ex. F, a total amount of 85 grounds 85 square feet and that area is exclusive of the piece of land lying between plots 1 and 2 on the northern side which is land dedicated to a temple and which piece of temple land amounts to 3 grounds. Until this land was surveyed, no one could tell how much area would be required for the roadway and the area occupied by the roadway upon the property sold according to Mr. Duraiswami Pillai is something short of 8 grounds. On the easterly border of this land there are three plots which were not included in this sale deed and marked on the plan as sold. Between the larger of these plots and the two smaller ones the continuation of the roadway I have mentioned runs and the three plots together occupy an area of about 15 grounds and the roadway an area of about 1½ grounds. It is rather indicative when one adds this 1½ grounds to the 7 grounds and some odd number of square feet one arrives roughly at the figure of 9 grounds which, plaintiff 2 said, he was told by the defendant had been reserved for the road.

In my view this question of the 9 grounds reserved for the road was entirely an afterthought. It did not and could not arise until the land had been surveyed for division into plots and this matter occurred to plaintiff 2 only some time after the execution of the sale deed and indeed after he had entered into occupation, in order to explain the reduction from 99 to 90 grounds, the amount of land which would be effectively used by him by re-selling and allocating the price at Rs. 200 a ground. In my view the sale was not of any land of particular dimensions but plaintiff 2 being very familiar with the land to be sold belonging to the defendant, after the earlier dispositions, desired only to buy that land and the question of its area was, if anything at all, but a secondary consideration and the price which was agreed and which appears in the sale deed was a price for that piece of land as a whole.

The defence to the claim is put in this way, that the defendant sold and the plaintiffs bought the property as a whole, that in regard to area, if that question arose, before the figure 99, the word 'about' is to be found which qualifies the area mentioned and indicates that there is no specific warranty that a special or expressed amount of land is to be conveyed; and it is further said that this property in the sale deed is described as lying within four boundaries, the four boundaries being particularly and expressly mentioned and since the description is indicated in that way, namely that the boundary of each of the four sides of the land is clearly expressed, no complaint can be made if the area found to exist is less than the area expressed as conveyed in the deed. Plaintiff 2 in the course of his evidence agreed that the land which was conveyed to him by the sale deed is to be found on the site bounded by the boundaries mentioned in the sale deed, that these boundaries accurately and properly indicate the limits on each of the four sides of the land. What the plaintiffs say is that they agreed to buy 99 grounds of land, they have obtained only 85, there are 14 grounds less than what there should be, and they are entitled to damages. I wish to say that except for P. W. 2, Mr. Duraiswami Pillai, the surveyor and P. W. 3 Mr. Loganatha Mudali, who were witnesses whose evidence I accept, in so far as any testimony given by any witness called on behalf of the plaintiffs or the defendant including the parties themselves is concerned, I am not relying upon any of their evidence save where it is borne out by a document or is in accord with the testimony given by other witnesses.

The sale deed Ex. F describes the property sold. It gives the boundaries of the whole of the Koyyatope garden on the north, south, east and west with the paimash numbers and the cawnies contained in each paimash and goes on to say that out of this land there has been sold 14¾ grounds and the balance of this land pertains to the sale deed and it says this balance is about 99 grounds. The plaintiffs, by plaintiff 2 and the defendant were buying and selling respectively the balance left of the whole land which originally was owned by the defendant less the land which had been sold previously. The extent of the land sold was known to plaintiff 2 and similarly he was aware of what land was to be and was eventually the subject of the sale by the defendant. And, as I have said, he has admitted that this piece of land was accurately described in the sale deed by the boundaries therein mentioned. Quite apart from whatever the area of the piece of land might be, he knew exactly what he was buying. The statement "about 99 grounds" was not in my view a part of the description of what he was buying but was only a statement auxiliary to the description of the land which was sold. This land was fully and accurately described and any inaccuracy in any later description in my view has no effect upon the sale. In (1843) 11 M & W 183,[3] Baron Parke, at p. 189, in the course of his judgment, says :

> Then the other rule of law applies, that as soon as there is an adequate and sufficient definition with definite certainty of what is intended to pass by a deed, any subsequent erroneous addition will not vitiate according to the maxim falsa demonstratio non nocet.

And, Baron Alderson at p. 190 agreeing with Baron Parke, adds :

> It is quite clear that, applying the true principles of law to the construction of this deed, we must be governed by the description contained in it, and cannot travel out of it, to consider what the parties may have intended.

(1883) 11 Q B D 255[4] was a case in which the land, the subject of a contract of sale, was described as containing by estimation 3 acres or thereabouts and by admeasurement after completion of the purchase there was found to be only 2 acres 1 rood 12 perches, that is to say a deficiency of nearly one-third of the area described in the conveyance. Watkin Williams J. at p. 267 says this :

> I am of opinion, in the first place, that it has been the established practice of the Court of Chancery that a bill for compensation properly so called, the purchaser retaining the property, could not be entertained after the completion of the contract and execution of the conveyance, and that the jurisdiction under which compensation was granted was exercised only as auxiliary to specific performance and was never exercised independently.

And later at page 268 he says this :

This rule seems to me also to rest upon sound principles of law and equity, because if it were otherwise, a purchaser might after conveyance, and while still insisting upon retaining the estate, ask for an abatement of the agreed purchase money, which would be wholly contrary to every principle. If he came before conveyance, he might, if misled, even by an innocent error, fairly say to the vendor, 'I have been misled, and do not wish to have the estate, and if you insist upon my performing the contract and taking it, a fair abatement from the price ought to be made', in which case the vendor would be placed in a fair position, because if he was unwilling to part with his estate at the reduced price he might retain it; on the other hand if the purchaser was entitled to insist upon retaining the estate, and at the same time claim an abatement of the price, the result would be that a vendor on account of a perfectly innocent and unintentional error might be compelled to part with his estate for a price that he never had and never would have agreed to, which appears to me contrary not only to the express terms of the contract but to every principle of law and justice.

At page 274 the learned Judge adds :

It appears that the defendant had himself bought the land by the description that it contained by estimation three acres or thereabouts, that he never measured it, and that he in fact believed it to be three acres ; that the plaintiff himself saw the land and was content to take it at the estimated quantity, and believed it to amount to three acres, and there is nothing, except the bare fact of the error, to show that this estimate was an irrational, still less an impossible one.

From this case it seems that the law in England is that when land is sold, properly described, and when the area given is expressed to be by way of estimate—such words as 'estimate' or 'about' or 'thereabouts', to my mind in this respect have similar meanings— the purchaser cannot keep the land and at the same time claim compensation for any deficiency in amount expressed to be by estimate. Turning to the cases in India, 57 I C 957[5] is a case in which property in Bombay was the subject of a sale and was clearly and specifically described by boundaries in the sale deed. This document also expressed the area to be by admeasurement 1480 square yards. In fact there was only 1280 square yards, roughly one-seventh deficient. The head-note says this :

Held that the property having been otherwise sufficiently described and having been fully known to the plaintiff, the mention of 1480 square yards was no more than a false description which had prejudiced no one.

Scott C. J. at p. 959, after saying that the property sold was described in every possible and conceivable manner, adds this :

There can be no possible doubt as to the property agreed to be transferred. It may measure 1482 square yards or it may measure 1282 square yards. But whatever it measures I am of opinion that the plaintiffs had determined to buy it and were prepared to pay the price of Rs. 7,41,000. In my opinion therefore the defendants are not unable to perform the whole of their contract. The mention of 1482 square yards, though the property which has been actually measured proved to be of a smaller area, is no more than a false description which prejudices no one since the subject matter of the conveyance was known without any possible shadow of doubt.

I am satisfied there was in this case no shadow of a doubt in plaintiff 2's mind of the property which he was buying when he entered into the sale deed with the defendant. Scott C. J. at p. 960 says this:

If I could have held that there had been failure on the part of the defendants to perform the whole of their part of the contract, I should still be unable to award to the plaintiffs the relief claimed by them, for the Court may only award compensation in money for the deficiency where the part left unperformed bears only a small proportion to the whole in value. According to the plaintiff's case, the part unperformed may amount to anything between Rs. 50,000 and a lakh. It is one-seventh in area of the whole of this very valuable town site, and it would be a misuse of language to say that the part alleged to be unperformed bears only a small proportion to the whole in value.

Hayward J. agreeing with the learned Chief Justice says at the same page :

The area was not basis of the price settled between the parties. The sale was for a lump sum. The area did not restrict the settlement to a portion only of the property.

This is not a suit for specific performance and for compensation. It is a suit in which the plaintiffs having affirmed and indicated their intention to abide by the sale deed are asking for compensation by way of damages, at the same time retaining and affirming the contract. The alleged deficiency, namely the difference between 85 and 99 or 14 grounds, cannot be said to be a small proportion of the whole. S. 14, Specific Relief Act, provides that :

Where a party to a contract is unable to perform the whole of his part of it, but the part which must be left unperformed bears only a small proportion to the whole in value and admits of compensation in money, the Court may, at the suit of either party, direct the specific performance of so much of the contract as can be performed and award compensation in money for the deficiency.

In my view 14 out of 99 grounds is much larger a proportion than is contemplated by S. 14. When the deficiency is a considerable portion, then S. 15 is the relevant one under the Specific Relief Act. This provides:

> Where a party to a contract is unable to perform the whole of his part of it, and the part which must be left unperformed forms a considerable portion of the whole, or does not admit of compensation in money, he is not entitled to obtain a decree for specific performance. But the Court may, at the suit of the other party, direct the party in default to perform specifically so much of his part of the contract as he can perform, provided that the plaintiff relinquishes all claim to further performance, and all right to compensation either for the deficiency or for the loss or damage sustained by him through the default of the defendant.

Though, as I pointed out, this is not a suit for specific performance, the principles must be the same and when a party wishes to affirm, as these plaintiffs do, a contract and the deficiency is not inconsiderable, they are not entitled to compensation for any deficiency that there may be. But the matter does not rest there. If one looks again at the English case I have already indicated, (1883) 11 Q B D 255,[4] there was a considerable proportion of deficiency. In (1812) 1 V & B 375,[6] the deficiency was 6 acres, namely 35 instead of 41, and relief was not given. In this case I have no doubt that the plaintiffs through plaintiff 2 obtained exactly what they set out to buy, namely the remaining portion of the Koyyatope garden which remained unsold in November 1932. Plaintiff 2 knew the property well, was thoroughly conversant with its boundaries and indeed its extent, and if he was so minded, not indeed that I think it makes any difference, he could easily have had the land measured and surveyed before he entered into the sale deed of 11th November 1932. The plaintiffs have obtained for a round sum—price of Rs. 17,500, land which they were bargaining to buy. The question of the exact area that land contained in my view is a matter quite immaterial to this sale and indeed was given no thought, to my mind, by plaintiff 2 when he was negotiating the price. There is not in the sale deed a warranty that the land contains 99 grounds. It is that it contains about 99 grounds. I am not suggesting that 85 may be about 99, but am merely indicating that the question of area was not one upon which reliance was placed. If reliance had been placed upon the actual area, the word 'about' would not have been included in the sale deed. If it was a sale of an exact area, the sale deed by its verbiage would so have described it and it has not done so. It has described it actually by metes and bounds as plaintiff 2 acknowledges, and the result therefore is that the plaintiffs' claim fails and the suit is dismissed with costs.

I wish to say this about costs. In the course of the proceedings, the defendant swore an affidavit of document on 3rd January 1934, disclosing only one document, namely the sale deed and in para. 4 of the affidavit in the usual way she deposes that according to her best knowledge, information and belief she had not then and never had had in her possession, custody or power any further documents. During the course of the trial the learned counsel on behalf of the defendant produced documents one after the other, none of which were in the affidavit of documents. This is not a proper way of conducting litigation and is simply flaunting the discovery proceedings of this Court. In consequence of this, costs being in my discretion, whatever may be the amount recoverable by the defendant from the plaintiffs, I order a sum of Rs. 25 to be deducted therefrom as the discovery made by her was totally inadequate and improper, and this amount I assess as being the sum appropriate to the discovery proceedings.

Second Appeals Nos. 666 and 667 of 1933, Decided on 9th September 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Vizagapatam, in A. S. Nos. 69 of 1931 and 253 of 1930.

(a) Mortgage—Person borrowing amount less than Rs. 100 and executing document thereby intending to mortgage property from ensuing year—Before beginning of that year, document is agreement to mortgage and delivery at the time of execution of document is not necessary.

A person borrowed an amount less than Rs. 100 and executed a document stating "I have mortgaged to you with possession from the ensuing year . . . . . ":

Held that the actual mortgage of the property was intended to take place the following year. Before the date on which the mortgage was to operate, the document would presumably amount to an agreement to mortgage and delivery of the property was not necessary at the time the document was drawn up : A I R 1917 Oudh 203 and A I R 1928 Mad 546, Disting. [P 86 C 2]

(b) Estoppel—Mortgage of property—Mortgagee leasing it to third person—Property resurveyed while lessee in possession—Lessee attorning to zamindar and registered as pattadar without there being any reference by lessee of his derivative title from mortgagor—Lessee held estopped from denying mortgagor's title even after attorning to zamindar.

A person mortgaged the property and the mortgagee leased it to a third person. While the lessee was in possession, there was a resurvey of the estate. The lessee was registered as pattadar and he attorned to the zamindar. The lessee took the patta from the zamindar without making a reference to his derivative title from the mortgagor. The mortgagor after redemption claimed the property :

Held that the lessee was estopped from denying the title of the mortgagor even after he attorned to the zamindar, for there was no change in the nature of his possession : A I R 1926 Mad 187, Disting. [P 87 C 1, 2]

Judgment.—The plaintiffs in these two suits mortgaged a certain property to defendants 1 and 2; and there is evidence that the latter subsequently leased the property to defendants 4 and 5. The Appellate Court seems to have accepted this evidence; and it must therefore be assumed for the purpose of this appeal that the lease by the mortgagees to defendants 4 and 5 has been proved. While defendants 4 and 5 were in possession, there was a resurvey of the Vizianagaram estate in which these properties are situated; and defendants 4 and 5 were then registered as pattadars. The plaintiffs now bring these suits for the recovery of this property after redemption. The trial Court dismissed the suits; but the Appellate Court held that they were entitled to redeem. Defendants 4 and 5 have therefore filed these second appeals.

It has first been argued that there was no valid mortgage at all, because although the amount of the mortgage under these documents was less than Rs. 100, no immediate delivery took place. Reliance is placed on the fact that the deed is described as a mortgage deed and on the recital that by this document the land has been usufructuarily mortgaged to defendants 1 and 2. It has however to be remembered that although it is true that Ex. A does contain this expression, yet when the document is read as a whole it seems clear that the parties did not intend that the mortgage should operate at once; for example, after the preamble and the recital of the necessity for borrowing money, the document begins "we have mortgaged to you with possession from the ensuing year Durmukhi thereunder". Whatever value for the appellants the use of the past tense in 'we have mortgaged' might have, it is neutralised by the use of the words 'from the ensuing year.' "We have mortgaged to you with possession from the ensuing year" has no grammatical meaning. The nature of the transaction therefore seems to have been that on the date of Ex. A money was needed by the executants of Ex. A, that money was paid, and that the actual mortgage of the property was to take place the following year. Before the date on which the mortgage was to operate, Ex. A would presumably amount to an agreement to mortgage. Many cases have been quoted in which delivery was not given in pursuance of an agreement; and the Court was asked to consider the documents as agreements to sell or mortgage, as the case may be, the actual sale or mortgage being deferred until the time of delivery; and in which it was held that the documents could not be so construed. But in none of these cases did the documents themselves show that it was not the intention of the parties that possession should be given at once.

The only case that bears any resemblance to the present one is 41 I C 455,[1] where the transaction was apparently a simple mortgage with a stipulation that if the money was not repaid within a certain time, possession was to be given. It is therefore possible to distinguish that case; but if it were there intended to lay down any general principle that delivery must take place at the time the document is drawn up, I would respectfully differ. Reliance has already been placed on the much discussed case, A I R 1928 Mad 546,[2] in which the question of the proof of a mortgage for an amount less than Rs. 100 came up for consideration. As the mortgage was for less than Rs. 100, the parties were not bound to draw up any document at all; and the learned Judges in that case, as will be seen from the head-note, were of opinion that:

> The moment the parties for some reason consider that it is not sufficient to effect the transaction of sale by mere delivery of property, but require that as evidence of such transaction there should be a deed or document, the transaction can scarcely be correctly described as one effected by mere delivery of property, > and again,
> but the moment the parties reduce the terms to writing, it is the writing that thereafter must be regarded as containing and setting out the terms of the contract, and it would not be an apt or correct description of the transaction to call it a sale by delivery of property.

The exact effect of the drawing up of an unregistered document for a sum less than Rs. 100 has been much discussed in later cases; but it is not necessary to refer to these cases because this case can be clearly distinguished in that the mortgage was not intended to operate at once and that the delivery was an independent transaction that took place a year later. It cannot be said therefore that the parties did not here intend to effect a mortgage by delivery. It has lastly been argued that even if the appellants were lessees, the fact that they attorned to the zamindar of Vizianagaram in 1902 gives them an independent title and that they are no longer estopped from denying the title of the plaintiffs. It is conceded that as lessees from the mortgagees, they are in no better position than the mortgagees and that just as the mortgagees were estopped from denying the title of the mortgagors, so the defendants, had it not been for the resurvey in 1902, would have been estopped from denying the title of the plaintiffs. It is argued that Ex. J (1), the patta issued by the zamindar to the defendants, shows that the zamindar did not admit that the tenants had any occupancy rights. It is argued, on the authority in 49 M L J 742,[3] that if the zamindar either evicted the appellants or did some act signifying that he no longer admitted their right to remain in possession as lessees of the mortgagees and the plaintiffs, then the mere fact that the appellants continued in possession after attorning to the zamindar would not prevent them from setting up a title against the mortgagors. That contention is no doubt correct; but there is no evidence on the record which serves as a basis for that argument. Presumably, the settlement officer who issued the patta in the name of the defendants did so because the appellants were in possession and claimed the right to remain in possession. There is no reason to believe that the estate authorities insisted on issuing a patta to the appellants in spite of the fact that they knew that the appellants only derived their title from the plaintiffs. One must therefore presume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the appellants made no reference to the title that they derived from the plaintiffs and that they were willing to take the patta from the zamindar without making a reference to their derivative title from the plaintiffs. I do not consider therefore that 49 M L J 742[3] in any way helps the appellants. There being no evidence that their possession was threatened by the zamindar in 1902, they are estopped from denying the right of the plaintiffs even after 1902; for there was no change in the nature of their possession. The appeals are therefore dismissed with costs one set of Rs. 35 in each case. Leave to appeal is refused.

Second Appeal No. 567 of 1933, Decided on 28th April 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, Chittor, in A. S. No. 6 of 1932.

 Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 78— Gross neglect—Meaning — Prior mortgagee failing to secure title deeds and delaying registration to enable mortgagor to secure necessary funds for payment of amount due to him—Subsequent mortgagee taking mortgage after satisfying himself that there was no prior mortgage — Prior mortgagee held guilty of gross neglect.

Any act or omission on the part of the prior mortgagee which has enabled the mortgagor to deal with the property as if it was not encumbered would be gross neglect within the meaning of S. 78. Though failure to secure the title deeds or delay in registration each standing by itself may not be evidence of negligence, yet both circumstances taken together coupled with such conduct on the mortgagee's part which would have the effect of inducing a subsequent mortgagee to advance money on the faith that the property was not encumbered, may be evidence of gross negligence. [P 89 C 1, 2]

Where the prior mortgagee failed to secure the title deeds and delayed registration in order to enable the mortgagor to secure the necessary funds for payment of the amount due to him, that is, to raise the money by borrowing or by selling any of his properties and the subsequent mortgagee took the mortgage after satisfying that there was no prior encumbrance:

Held that the prior mortgagee was guilty of gross negligence and hence his mortgage was postponed to that of the subsequent mortgagee: A I R 1930 Cal 22, Approved. [P 89 C 2]

Judgment.—The question involved in this second appeal is whether the mortgage in favour of defendant 2 dated 12th May 1927 is entitled to priority over the plaintiff's mortgage dated 10th March 1927. To determine the point in controversy, a few facts may be necessary. Defendant 1 admittedly was a person who became indebted some time prior to 1927 and this is evidenced by the fact that there was a sum of Rs. 2,000 for principal and interest due to one Motichand: vide Ex. 8. It is stated that the amount due to Motichand was also secured by an equitable mortgage evidenced by Ex. 8.a. It is the case of defendant 2 that in order to discharge this equitable mortgage, defendant 1 borrowed from him a sum of Rs. 2,000 on 9th March 1927 on a promissory note bearing the said date and as security for repayment thereof executed also an equitable mortgage evidenced by Ex. 2.a, but he was also desiring to take a registered simple mortgage after he got an encumbrance certificate, assuring himself that there were no encumbrances on the property. This encumbrance certificate was obtained and delivered on 11th May 1927 which disclosed no registered encumbrances on the property. On 12th May 1927 a simple mortgage was executed in his favour for a sum of Rs. 2,500 part thereof being a sum of Rs. 2,185.15.0 being the amount stated to be due in respect of the loan already advanced by him and part thereof Rs. 314.0.2 advanced on the date of the mortgage. This mortgage was duly registered. His case further is that on his mortgage he obtained a decree and brought the properties to sale, and at the time when he brought the properties to sale in execution of his decree, he found that there was a mortgage in favour of the plaintiff, but in the meanwhile the plaintiff has instituted this suit on his mortgage. In defence thereto, defendant 2 pleaded in para. 4 of the written statement that he obtained a simple mortgage dated 12th May 1927 after assuring himself that there was no kind of encumbrances thereon and obtaining an encumbrance certificate dated 11th May 1927. He further pleaded the equitable mortgage dated 9th February 1927. It may be stated that the title deeds were produced by defendant 2, and it is his case that it was handed over to him on the date of the equitable mortgage or at any rate it may be taken that he was in possession of the title deeds on the date of his simple mortgage of 12th May 1927. There are other defences raised which it is not now material to consider for the point on which I propose to rest my decision. One of the issues in the case is " is defendant 2 entitled to priority, and if so, for what amount?".

The learned Subordinate Judge found in favour of defendant 2 on the equitable mortgage and gave priority on that footing to the extent of the amount covered by the equitable mortgage and for the balance amount Rs. 314 which was advanced on the date of the simple mortgage, under S. 76, T. P. Act. The learned District Judge on appeal was of the opinion that the equitable mortgage relied on was inadmissible in evidence on the ground that Ex. 2.a which evidenced the mortgage required registration. He further found that this equitable mortgage could not have come into existence on the date on which it purported to have come into existence, but he nevertheless found that the sum of Rs. 2,000 was really advanced by defendant 2 for discharging the loan in favour of Motichand. At any rate, according to him, the evidence is in favour of the discharge being on the date of 12th May 1927. I accept the said finding. What is the result? It must be taken that the entire sum of Rs. 2,500 must be deemed to have been advanced on 12th May 1927. Under what circumstances did he advance the amount? He wanted to assure himself that there was no prior encumbrance on the property. He insisted on an encumbrance certificate and got it and it disclosed no encumbrance. He secured possession of the title deeds of the property and he got also an assurance from the mortgagor by introducing a recital to that effect in his mortgage deed. The question is, under such circumstances, is he not entitled to priority under S. 78, T. P. Act, over that of the plaintiff's mortgage? Under S. 78, before defeating a prior mortgagee of his right to recover the money under his mortgage in preference to all mortgages subsequent to the mortgage in his favour, it must be found as a fact that the prior mortgagee was guilty of fraud, misrepresentation or gross neglect. There is no question of fraud and misrepresentation in this case. The only question is whether there was gross neglect on his part. In my opinion, any act or omission on the part of the prior mortgagee which has enabled the mortgagor to deal with the property as if it was not encumbered would be gross neglect within the meaning of the section. I am prepared to accept the definition given by Page J. in 56 Cal 868[1] relied on by Mr. Somayya, wherein at p. 884 the learned Judge says thus :

> In my opinion, 'gross neglect' in S. 78 means and involves failure on the part of the prior mortgagee to take such reasonable precautions against the risk of a subsequent encumbrancer being deceived as in the circumstances renders it unjust that the earlier mortgage should retain its priority.

The question is, what is the act or omission which can be attributed to the prior mortgagee which would render his conduct to be grossly negligent? In his mortgage dated 10th March 1927 the mortgagor assured him that there was no alienation in favour of anybody. In token of that assurance there is the following recital "In support hereof I have delivered four title deeds to you," and it is a fact that the title deeds were not delivered on that date. It is no doubt, as pointed out in 31 Mad 7,[2] that the mere failure to secure possession of the title deeds may not be such evidence of gross negligence as would defeat his right to get the money secured on his mortgage in preference to other subsequent mortgagees, but the matter does not rest on the mere failure to secure possession of the title deeds. He has delayed registration of his document until June 1927. The case in 31 Mad 7[2] is again relied on by Mr. Somayya for the position that even though he may have delayed registration, still the delay coupled with the fact of his not securing the title deeds would not amount to gross negligence as laid down in that decision, but as that decision itself points out, there must not have been any conduct on the part of the mortgagee which would disentitle him to the relief which he can justly claim by reason of his being a prior mortgagee, that is, he must not have been guilty of any act or conduct on his part which would have the effect of inducing a subsequent mortgagee to advance money on the faith that it was not encumbered. He must not be himself a party to any act by which the mortgagor would be enabled to deal with the property. Failure to secure the title deeds or the delay in registration are circumstances each standing by itself may not be evidence of negligence, but both circumstances taken together, coupled with the other conduct, may be evidence of gross negligence. Now the plaintiff in his deposition admits what the reason for the delay is. He states thus :

> D. 1 asked me to delay the registration saying that he would pay back the amount soon and registration would make the transaction public and bring him to disgrace. He was a merchant and a Union member of Tiruttani. So I agreed to delay.

This shows that he allowed the mortgagor to delay registration in order to enable the mortgagor to secure the necessary funds for payment of the amount due to him, that is, to raise the money by borrowing or by selling any of his properties. Under such circumstances, allowing the mortgagor to retain the title deeds would be tantamount to allowing the mortgagor to deal with the property in order to enable him to raise and pay the money due under the mortgage. It seems to me, therefore, the plaintiff was guilty of gross negligence within the meaning of S. 78, T. P. Act. Mr. Somayya strenuously argued that the plea based on S. 78, T. P. Act, was not raised in the written statement, and it is not open to the Courts to go into that plea, and his client was put to considerable inconvenience thereby. I quite admit that the plea should have been taken in the written statement, but there were facts alleged in the written statement on which such a plea can be found, because para. 4 of the written statement distinctly states that the simple mortgage was taken on the faith of an assurance given to the mortgagee that there was no encumbrance and after defendant 2 satisfied himself by production of the encumbrance certificate that there was no mortgage. Further, one of the issues in the case is, as I have already stated, "Is defendant 2 entitled to priority and if so to what amount?". In the first Court, at any rate, to the extent of Rupees 314-0-2 the plea based on S. 78, T. P. Act, was allowed to be raised and gone into by the first Court. Therefore if the plea to the extent of Rs. 314 0 2 was allowed to be gone into, I do not see that any more facts are necessary for the plea in regard to the rest of the amount secured by the document. In the view the first Court took it was not necessary to base its decision on S. 78 in regard to the amount covered by the alleged equitable mortage, though I must say that the first Court was even prepared to find in regard to the entire amount even on S. 78, T. P. Act. The learned Judge observes thus in para. 21 :

Defendant 2 had taken all reasonable precautions before Ex 5, and had insisted on an encumbrance certificate up to date. It was the plaintiff's negligence in not getting Ex. A registered forthwith and the absence of mention of his mortgage in the encumbrance certificate Ex. 4-b that induced defendant 2 to continue his loan under Ex. 2 and to advance a new loan of Rs. 314-0-2.

Now that the learned District Judge was not prepared to uphold the equitable mortgage and only finds that an entire sum of Rs. 2,500 must have been advanced on the date of Ex. 5, there is no reason for disallowing the priority under S. 78 in respect of the entire amount on the facts as found. I therefore set aside his decree. Defendant 2 is hereby declared entitled to priority in respect of the sum of Rupees 2,938.13.4 allowed by the first Court. Therefore, the decree of the learned District Judge will be varied by allowing priority to defendant 2 in respect of this amount. In regard to the question of costs, I think defendant 2 is entirely to blame in not specifically raising this plea in the written statement and he left it to the Courts to give him the relief on the facts deposed to by the plaintiff. In the circumstances I direct each party to bear his own costs throughout. The memorandum of objections is dismissed but without costs. (Leave to appeal refused).

T. V. Ramanatha Iyer — for Respondent.

Leach C. J.—In this appeal the Court is called upon to interpret the provisions of S. 69, Madras District Municipalities Act, 1920, as amended by the Act of 1933. At a public auction held in 1927 at the instance of the Municipal Council of Dharapuram the respondent purchased the right of collecting the tolls to be levied on all vehicles entering the municipal area during the year commencing 1st April 1927. His bid was Rs. 47,800, which he agreed to pay in 12 equal instalments on the 15th of each month. He further agreed to pay a penalty of Rs. 2 per diem for every day in respect of which he was in default in payment. He did not however observe the conditions of the contract. His payments were irregular and he did not complete them. Altogether he paid to the Municipal Council a sum of Rs. 37,820.3.0, which meant that he was in default to the extent of Rs. 9,979.13.0, apart from the penalties for which the contract stipulated. Nothing turns on the question of the validity of the penalty clause. The suit out of which the appeal arises was filed to recover a sum of Rs. 12,025-13-0, made up of the Rupees 9,979-13-0 and Rs. 2,046, claimed by way of penalty.

Having purchased the right of collecting the tolls, a contract was drawn up and executed by the respondent, whose signature was witnessed by the Vice-Chairman of the Municipal Council and by two other members. The Vice-Chairman and the two members merely signed the document as witnesses to the signature of the respondent. This appears from the document itself, but the matter is put beyond all controversy by the evidence of Abdul Karim Sahib, the Chairman of the Council, who admitted that they had merely signed as witnesses. Sub-s. (1) of S. 69 of the Act provides that every contract made by, or on behalf of, a Council whereof the value or amount exceeds Rs. 100 shall be in writing and except in the case of contracts made under the provisions of sub-s. (3) of S. 68 (with which we are not concerned), shall be signed by two Municipal Councillors. Sub-s. (2) says that a contract executed or made otherwise than in conformity with the provisions of the section shall not be binding on the Municipal Council. The trial Court held that S. 69 had not been complied with because the contract had not been executed by two members of the Council, and we are asked to say that this decision is wrong. The Council sued on the contract and it was conceded by the learned advocate who appeared in support of the appeal that if the document was not signed in accordance with the provisions of the section the appellant Council was out of Court. He however maintained that it was in fact signed in accordance with the section. Before turning to the authorities, I will refer to S. 68 which has also some bearing on the question under discussion. That section inter alia provides that in respect of a contract whereof the value or amount exceeds Rs. 1,000, the sanction of the Council should be obtained before the contract is made. There is no evidence that the Council here ever approved of the terms of the contract and no evidence to show that the three members who witnessed the contract were ever authorized to sign it. It was not even proved that the three members referred to knew the nature of the document. The learned advocate for the appellant relies on a dictum of Lord Eldon in (1804) 9 Ves 234=7 R R 167.[1] Lord Eldon there said:

> It is true that where a party, or principal or person to be bound, signs as, what he cannot be, a witness, he cannot be understood to sign otherwise than as principal.

This dictum was not accepted by Lord Denman C. J. in (1835) 2 Ad & E 500=111 E R 193.[2] After quoting the words of Lord Eldon, Lord Denman C. J. proceeded to observe:

> But I think that remark open to much observation. A witness might be drawn into transactions which he did not contemplate, and of which he was ignorant. That would be a great step to take; no such decision has been actually made; and, if it had, I should pause, unless I found it sanctioned by the very highest authority, before I hold that a party attesting was bound by the instrument.

It seems to me that the criticism of Lord Denman is well founded. If a person has signed a document merely as a witness and this is expressed on the face of the document, I fail to understand how he can be deemed to have appended his signature in another capacity. The question is really one of evidence as was pointed out in (1883) 11 Q B D 651.[3] In the course of the judgment in that case, Lord Esher (then Brett M. R.) said:

> But the questions whether a person has signed his name at the foot of a document, and if so, for what purpose, are questions of evidence, and any evidence on the subject which does not contradict the document is admissible.

Here the evidence is that the three members of the Council signed as witnesses and in no other capacity. There was no intention to sign as executants on behalf of the Council, and as it is common ground that they signed merely as witnesses, it cannot be said that the document was executed by them on behalf of the Council. The Calcutta High Court expressed the same opinion in 34 Cal 1030.[4] There the document was signed by the Chairman and was witnessed by two Commissioners who did not sign it as contracting parties, which the law required them to do before the document could be sued upon.

It having been decided that the Council was not able to sue on the contract, it was agreed by the parties that the suit should proceed and be decided on the basis of a quantum meruit. The matter was then referred to a Commissioner to record evidence and report whether anything was due by the respondent to the Council. He reported that as the respondent had received a sum of Rs. 37,096.1.8 and had paid to the Council Rs. 37,820.3.0, there was nothing due by him. No attempt was made by the Council, either before the Commissioner or in Court, to show that the respondent had in fact received more than this sum or Rs. 37,096.1.8, but stress was laid on the failure of the respondent to produce a certain book of account. Although the criticism here appears to have been well founded, the failure to produce the book is not sufficient to entitle the Municipal Council to a decree against the respondent. The Council ought to have placed before the Court evidence on which it could form an estimate of what was due by the respondent to the Council. They did not do so and the learned trial Judge rightly held that they were not entitled to recover anything. The learned trial Judge directed the parties to bear their own costs. This decision has also been challenged, but again no adequate reason has been given for varying it. The appeal therefore fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 2 of 1937, Decided on 22nd July 1937, from judgment of Wadsworth J. in Suit No. 231 of 1933.

Civil P. C. (1908), S. 92—Applicability—Suit for accounts by trustee against co-trustee — S. 92 does not apply — Nature of relief prayed for is not conclusive and exclusive test in determining applicability of S. 92.

Sub-section (2) of S. 92, though expressed in general terms, must be read along with sub-s. (1) and it follows on such reading that it is not every suit claiming any of the reliefs specified in sub-s. (1) that should be brought with the consent of the Advocate-General, but those suits only which besides claiming any of those reliefs are brought by individuals as representatives of the general public. In a suit for accounts brought by a trustee against a co-trustee, the relief, though it may be of the kind mentioned in S. 92 (1), is not sought in the larger interests of the public but is merely for the purpose of vindicating the private rights of one of the trustees and of enabling him to discharge the duties and liabilities which are imposed upon him by the trust. S. 92 has therefore no application and no sanction of Advocate-General is necessary before its institution. The nature of the relief prayed for in a suit cannot be made the conclusive and exclusive test in determining the applicability of S. 92 : A I R 1922 Mad 17 (F B), followed and held not shaken by A I R 1928 P C 16; Case law discussed. [P 94 C 2]

Leach C. J. — This appeal arises out of a suit for an account and other reliefs instituted by certain trustees against their co-trustees on the Original Side of this Court. In Royapuram, Madras, is an Indian Hindu temple known as Subrahmanyaswami Koil, which belongs, according to the pleadings, to the Pattinava sect of the Hindus. The plaintiffs' case is that in 1922 a meeting of the members of the community was held at Royapuram at which the plaintiffs and defendants 1 to 3 were elected trustees for the purpose of collecting subscriptions for the improvement of the temple, for the performance of the rites therein and for the conduct of festivals and other cognate matters, with power to spend the collections on these objects. It is common ground that this meeting was held and that the plaintiffs and defendants 1 to 3 were elected trustees for these purposes. The contesting defendants, defendants 2 and 3, however, aver that the duties of the trustees were not confined to the temple and say that they were also given authority to collect and spend for the good of the community in general and for purposes of general utility. The plaintiffs allege that defendants 1 and 2 were acting as the managing trustees and were throughout in charge of all the moneys collected and the accounts, defendants 1 and 2 being the only literate members of the Board. Defendant 3 admittedly never took any part in the management of the affairs of the trust and as defendant 1 died after the institution of the suit, the case is really confined to the question of the liability of defendant 2. The plaintiffs further allege that from 1922 to the date of the suit, large sums of money were collected by defendants 1 and 2 who utilised them for their own purposes and suppressed the accounts. The contesting defendants deny that there is any truth in the allegation that defendants 1 and 2 utilised the trust money for their own purposes or that they suppressed the accounts. It is clear from their written statement, however, that defendants 1 and 2 did participate in the management of the trust and are liable to account, and the learned trial Judge so held. Accordingly he directed that accounts should be taken from 9th November 1925 (the date from which the defendants admit the collections began) and referred the case to the Official Referee for the purpose.

It is not in dispute that this is a public trust and it is conceded that defendant 2 is liable to account. But it is said that the decision of the learned trial Judge is erroneous for two reasons: (1) because the suit could not be instituted without the sanction of the Advocate-General under S. 92, Civil P. C., and (2) because the learned trial Judge did not decide issue 4 before referring the suit to the Official Referee. Issue 4 is as follows : "What, if any, were the accounts maintained for the collections and by whom ?". The argument with regard to this issue is based on the contention that the plaintiffs are also accounting parties. Before the learned trial Judge there was no suggestion that they should also be made liable to account; the only question in this connexion was with regard to the liability of defendant 2. The learned trial Judge was therefore justified in adopting the course which he did.

The contention with regard to the necessity for the prior approval of the Advocate-General needs more consideration as it is said that the decision of this Court in 45 Mad 113[1] is no longer good law. In that case it was held by a Full Bench of five Judges that a suit by a trustee of a public, charitable or religious trust against a co-trustee for accounts does not fall within S. 92, Civil P. C. and may be brought without the sanction of the Advocate-General. It is said that this decision has been set at nought by the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 55 Cal 519,[2] and that of this Court in 58 Mad 988.[3] I can see nothing in these decisions to warrant any such assertion. Before referring to them, however, it is necessary to refer to the provisions of S. 92, Civil P. C. The section deals with the procedure to be adopted in a representative suit for relief in respect of a public trust. But to come within the section there must be a breach of trust or the necessity for the direction of the Court with regard to the administration of a trust. The section requires that there shall be at least two plaintiffs and that the Advocate-General must give his sanction to the institution of the suit. If these conditions are fulfilled, a suit can be launched under the section. It was never intended, in my opinion, that this section should take away the right of a trustee to launch a suit for an account against a co-trustee, unless he obtained the approval of the Advocate-General and I consider that it has not this effect. That a trustee has such a right cannot be denied. The right is necessary for his own protection; otherwise he might be made liable for acquiescing in unlawful dealings with the trust funds.

In 55 Cal 519[2] the Judicial Committee were careful to point out that in a Code regulating procedure it is unlikely that the Legislature intended without express words to abolish or extinguish substantive rights of an important nature which admittedly existed at the time the Code was enacted. If the argument advanced on behalf of the appellants were sound, it would mean that a trustee could not proceed against a co-trustee for an account without joining a third party and he could never proceed at all if the Advocate-General refused his sanction. This was pointed out by Oldfield J. in 45 Mad 115[1] and it appears to me to provide a complete answer to the appellant's case. The learned advocate for the appellants has relied on a passage in the judgment in 55 Cal 519,[2] where it was pointed out that in inserting sub-s. (2) of S. 92 the Legislature adopted the view of the Bombay High Court that a suit which prays for reliefs mentioned in S. 92 can only be instituted in accordance with the provisions of that section. But it must be a suit contemplated by that section and as I have already mentioned the Judicial Committee in this very case expressed the opinion that the section did not operate to abolish existing rights. With regard to 58 Mad 988[3], the learned Judges who decided that case pointed out that it was entirely a different case to that in 45 Mad 113[1] and there is nothing in the judgment which throws the slightest doubt on the correctness of the former decision.

1. Appanna v. Narasingha, A I R 1922 Mad 17 =69 I C 304=45 Mad 113=41 M L J 608 (F B).
2. Abdur Rahim v. Abu Mahomed Barkat Ali, A I R 1928 P C 16=108 I C 861=55 I A 96= 55 Cal 519 (P C).
3. Janaki Bai Ammal v. Vinayakar of Melmandai, A I R 1935 Mad 625 = 157 I C 63 = 58 Mad 988=69 M L J 291 (F B).

We have been referred to two other cases, 63 M L J 703[4] and 42 M L W 264.[5] In the first of these cases it was held that a trustee could not, apart from S. 92, ask for the framing of a scheme, and a suit which did ask for the framing of a scheme and did not comply with the section was bad to that extent. This is so, but the decision does not in any way assist the appellants in this case. It does not affect the question under discussion at all. The case in 42 M L W 264[5] was a decision of my learned brother Varadachariar J. My learned brother there held that the mere fact that the plaintiffs may in a sense be trustees will not necessarily preclude the application of S. 92, Civil P. C., if the reliefs in the suit relate not to the vindication of their personal rights, but to the advancement of the interests of the institution itself by securing more efficient management. A perusal of that judgment shows that the learned Judge was careful to distinguish the case where a plaintiff is suing to vindicate a personal right and that is what the plaintiffs are doing in the case out of which the present appeal arises. The correctness of the Full Bench decision in 45 Mad 113[1] is unshaken and we are bound by it. We accordingly hold that the learned trial Judge was right in deciding that the suit did not require the sanction of the Advocate General before institution.

I might mention that one of the prayers in the plaint asks for an injunction restraining defendant 2 from acting further as a trustee. The question whether such a prayer can be included in the present suit does not arise in the appeal and therefore I express no opinion on it. The appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Varadachariar J.—I respectfully agree. But, in view of the state of the authorities, I think it right to add a few observations on the question of the applicability of S. 92, Civil P. C., to a suit like the present. If the matter were res integra, it may be conceded that there is a fair volume of authority in favour of the wider construction of S. 92 contended for by Mr. Sesha Ayyangar on behalf of the appellant. The decisions referred to in the judgments in 45 Mad 113[1] are themselves sufficient to show this. I may add that even more recently the Bombay High Court has expressed views which seem to lend considerable support to the appellant's contention: see 26 Bom L R 950[6] and 35 Bom L R 1119.[7] So far however as this Court is concerned, we have to start with the fact that a Bench of five Judges have decided in 45 Mad 113[1] that S. 92 has no application to a suit like the present. The principle underlying that decision is perhaps best stated in the words of Sir D. F. Mulla: see page 309, Edn. 10, Civil Procedure Code, viz. that sub-s. (2) of S. 92, though expressed in general terms, must be read along with sub-s. (1) and it follows on such reading that :

> It is not every suit claiming any of the reliefs specified in sub-s. (1) that should be brought with the consent of the Advocate-General, but those suits only which besides claiming any of those reliefs are brought by individuals as representatives of the general public.

In a suit like the present, the relief though it may be of the kind mentioned in S. 92 (1) is not sought in the larger interests of the public but is merely for the purpose of vindicating the private rights of one of the trustees and of enabling him to discharge the duties and liabilities which are imposed upon him by the trust. That in certain circumstances similar reliefs may have to be prayed for in the one kind of action as in the other is pointed out in the judgment of Kumaraswami Sastri J. in 45 Mad 113.[1] It therefore does not seem to me right to make the nature of the relief prayed for in a suit the conclusive and exclusive test in determining the applicability of S. 92.

Mr. Sesha Ayyangar had, in view of the Full Bench decision, to contend that that decision can no longer be regarded as authoritative after the decision of the Judicial Committee in 55 Cal 519.[2] I agree with my Lord that there is nothing in the judgment of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee which throws doubt on the authority of Full Bench decision. As pointed out in the judgment just delivered, their Lordships have there taken care to say that it is too much to presume that the Legislature intended to make any serious alteration in the previous state of the law or to extinguish or impair pre-existing rights of action and that the main purpose of the enactment of sub-s. (2) of S. 92 was to settle the conflict of the previous state of the decisions in India. To understand the effect of this observation of their Lordships, some regard must be had to the previous state of authority in this country and attention must also be bestowed on the circumstances in which the question arose before the Judicial Committee. In that case the action had been brought by certain Mahomedan inhabitants of the neighbourhood who were interested in the institution. The suit was therefore not one by trustees who had any personal rights of their own to assert, but corresponded to what is spoken of as a representative suit on behalf of the public.

The contention before the Judicial Committee on the one side was that wherever the litigation related to a public trust, the suit could be framed only in accordance with the provisions of S. 92, Civil Procedure Code, and the reference in sub-s. (2) of S. 92 to the nature of the reliefs prayed for in such a suit was sought to be ignored by the appellant's learned counsel. It was in those circumstances that their Lordships emphasized the antithesis between a suit praying for reliefs specified in sub-s. (1) of S. 92 and for reliefs outside that sub-section and they observed that S. 92 could apply only to suits praying for reliefs specified in sub-s. (1). But as I have already pointed out, the whole discussion arose in connexion with what was undoubtedly a representative suit. It does not seem to me right to ignore that circumstance and read the judgment as laying down that even where a suit is not in any sense of a representative character, the mere fact that the reliefs asked for in the suit may fall within sub-s. (1) of S. 92, Civil P. C., was intended by their Lordships to be a conclusive test. Mr. Sesha Ayyangar relied on one observation on page 529 as supporting his contention that their Lordships must have had even suits based on individual rights in their contemplation when they laid down their proposition. This observation relates to the previous cases in India which had held that private persons who had individual rights under such trusts could bring suits to enforce such individual rights by an ordinary suit without being obliged to bring a suit of a representative nature as above-mentioned. It seems to me that Mr. Sesha Ayyangar's contention does not give effect to the words used in that sentence. That sentence clearly relates to cases where a representative suit could have been or might have been brought and not to cases where the cause of action sued on was such that no representative suit could have been brought.

An examination of the earlier cases in India will show that even when a suit was not intended to enforce a right in the nature of the rights of a trustee but related to the enforcement of the obligations of the defendant in the performance of the trust for the benefit of the public, it had been held that a suit of that kind need not necessarily be brought only in conformity with the provisions of S. 539 but may be brought either under O. 1, R. 8, Civil P. C., or even independently of it. It is in this sense that their Lordships point out that the question had arisen in this country whether the provisions of S. 539 were merely permissive or mandatory. The question of permissive or mandatory cannot possibly arise in respect of a suit which cannot be brought in a representative character at all. All that the Judicial Committee intended to lay down and did lay down was that wherever the cause of action on which the suit is founded is one which could have sustained a representative suit, the procedure prescribed by S. 92 must necessarily be followed and no suit could be maintained in any other form. I particularly wish to point out that in this judgment, their Lordships did not add the sentence which is somehow introduced in a later judgment of this Court, namely that the character of the plaintiff is immaterial. It is only in the judgment of this Court in 58 Mad 988[3] that Cornish J., in attempting to state the effect of the Privy Council decision, puts the antithesis in the following words :

> Whether the suit falls within S. 92 depends not upon the character in which the plaintiff sues but upon the nature of the relief sought.

With great respect I would state that this is not the proper test to be applied and was certainly not the test laid down by the Judicial Committee. It has sometimes been said that whenever relief is sought on the allegation of a breach of trust, the suit must necessarily be brought in conformity with S. 92, if it in any manner relates to a public charitable trust. Here again, I think, this will not be a safe or conclusive test, because an allegation of breach of trust may in certain circumstances be necessary even when a co-trustee is trying to assert or vindicate his own rights against other co-trustees who are in management: see 53 Mad 214.[8] The test seems to me to have been stated with fullness and accuracy in the passage that I have already cited from Sir D. F. Mulla's book. Even in Bombay the principle that S. 92 will not apply to suits instituted for the vindication of the right of management vested in the plaintiffs has always been recognized (see 28 Bom 20[9] at p. 54 and 26 Bom L R 950,[6] particularly the judgment of Fawcett J.), but differences have arisen mainly on the construction of the scope of the plaint in each case. In the view that we are bound by the judgment of the Full Bench in 45 Mad 113,[1] and that its authority has not been shaken by the decision of the Judicial Committee in 55 Cal 519[2], we have no alternative but to disallow the appellant's contention.

Leach C. J.—This appeal raises a question with regard to costs in a winding up petition. In November 1936 a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding up of the 'Tamil Nadu, Ltd.' a Company registered under the Indian Companies Act, 1913. The Company had been formed for the purpose of publishing a daily newspaper in Tamil in Madras. On 11th December 1936, the appellant filed a petition on the Original Side of this Court asking that an order might be passed for the winding up of the Company under the supervision of the Court. This action was taken as the result of a resolution passed at a meeting of creditors held on 2nd December 1936. On 15th December a further application was filed for the appointment of an interim Official Liquidator. These petitions came before Gentle J. on 27th April of this year. The learned advocate appearing for the appellant then informed the Court that his client did not propose to pursue the winding up petition and he had no interest in it. The learned Judge inquired whether any other creditor would proceed with the petition. I should mention that six creditors had entered appearances and professed to support the petition. Two of them, respondents 2 and 7, asked for time to look into the matter. Time was accordingly granted until next day when the case was again placed in the list. The learned advocate for respondent 2 intimated that his client would like to continue the petition in the place of the petitioner, but later realising that he was not in a position to prove facts which would justify a supervision order being passed, he informed the Court that he was not in a position to proceed further. Respondent 7 was also not willing to go on with the petition. In his case there was only a small amount due by the Company. The learned Judge then passed an order dismissing both the petitions ; and in respect of the petition for a supervision order, he directed that the petitioner should pay the costs of all parties appearing before him. As there were seven respondents, the voluntary liquidator and six creditors, this meant that the petitioner was required to pay seven sets of costs which would amount, we are told, to a sum of over Rs. 2,000. The petitioner has appealed against this order and contends that the learned Judge was not entitled to pass any order for costs against him.

While the position of the creditors who appeared is on a different basis, it is quite clear that the voluntary liquidator would have been entitled to his costs, because he had successfully opposed the petition. But he had agreed before the case came into Court on 27th April that he would not press for his costs and that there should be an order dismissing the petition without costs. In these circumstances, he does not ask for the dismissal of the appeal. In fact, he is quite agreeable to the appeal being allowed. Respondent 3 in the appeal leaves the matter in the hands of the Court. Respondents 2, 4, 5, 6 and 7 in the appeal strongly oppose the appeal. The question involves a reference to the provisions of the Rules of the Court and consideration of the principles which apply. Dealing first with the Rules, R. 27 of the Rules of the Original Side of this Court under the Companies Act provides that every petition for the winding up of any Company by the Court or subject to the supervision of the Court shall, after admission, be advertised fourteen clear days before the hearing, and the advertisement is required to be in the terms of Form No. 9 to be found at page 324 of the Rules. The form reads as follows :

> Notice is hereby given that a petition for the winding up of the above-named Company by the (or subject to the supervision of the) High Court of Judicature at Madras was on the day of 19 , presented to the High Court of Judicature at Madras, by the said Company (or A, B of , a creditor or contributory of the said Company, or as the case may be). And that the said petition is directed to be heard on the day of 19 ; and any creditor or contributory of the said Company desirous to oppose the making of an order for the winding up of the said Company under the above Act, should appear at the time of hearing by himself or his counsel or vakil for that purpose and a copy of the petition will be furnished to any creditor or contributory of the said Company requiring the same, by the undersigned, on payment of the regulated charge for the same.
> Attorneys or vakils for the petitioners.

It will be observed that this form only refers to the appearance of persons who desire to oppose the winding up order. It differs materially from the form prescribed by the English Rules which allow interested persons to appear to oppose or to support. Rule 101 of this Court states that in cases not provided for by the Rules or by the Rules of procedure laid down in the Act, the practice and procedure of the High Court of Justice in England in matters relating to Companies shall be followed so far as they are applicable and not inconsistent with the Rules and the Act. It is said that by reason of this Rule the English Rule can be applied here and that the Court is justified in regarding the notice to appear as an invitation to appear to oppose or to support. I am unable to accept this contention. It is quite clear from the form of the notice that this Court only intended notice to issue to persons who wished to oppose. The law allows the Court to permit another creditor to take the place of a petitioning creditor who does not wish to proceed with his petition, but this is another matter and does not really affect the point under discussion.

We have here a notice inviting creditors who wished to oppose the application for a winding up order to appear at the hearing. The creditor-respondents to this appeal appeared in answer to the notice issued, but they appeared to support, not to oppose, the petition. It is said that in these circumstances the petition having failed they are not entitled to costs in their favour. They supported a petition which the Court dismissed. We consider that there is great force in this argument. Moreover, none of the creditors who did appear were willing to undertake the burden of the petition. Respondent 2 did express his willingness at one time to undertake this burden, but he found it too much for him and quickly abandoned the idea. It seems to us that in these circumstances it is not open to him to oppose this appeal, and the same remark applies to the other opposing creditors.

We have been referred to a number of cases decided in England on questions relating to costs in winding up petitions. It appears to be usual there to allow one set of costs to the successful party and where the petition is withdrawn one set even to the supporting creditor or creditors. But it must be remembered that in England supporting creditors are invited to come in. They are not invited to come in under the Rules of this Court. The question of costs must be decided in the light of the facts of the particular case. As a general rule, the successful party is entitled to costs in his favour and the unsuccessful party is liable to have an order for costs against him. The opposing respondents in this case are not the successful parties. A case which has a general application is that in (1879) 10 Ch D 130,[1] where it was decided that a creditor appearing in a winding up petition is not entitled to his costs as a matter of right. To entitle him to them he must shew reasonable ground for appearing. In giving the judgment in this case, Jessel M. R. observed :

> I refuse these costs, and I will state my reasons for doing so. I by no means assent to the proposition that creditors appearing on a petition to wind up a Company are entitled to their costs as of right. It is usual to give one set of costs when many appear, and when there is a reasonable ground for appearing ; but I have said before, and I repeat it, that I will not lay down any such rule as that creditors are entitled to their costs as of right, because that would induce solicitors to instruct counsel simply for the purpose of obtaining costs, and for no other purpose whatever.

I do not wish to suggest that appearances have been entered in this case for the mere purpose of obtaining costs, but the appearances of the respondent creditors have not been justified. When they were called upon to adopt the petition they refused to do so. I will not pause to consider what their motives might have been, but it is clear that they have not made out a case for an order for costs in their favour. The only order for costs which might have been made in the circumstances was an order in favour of the voluntary liquidator, but he did not ask for it. The appeal will be allowed but we make no order for costs in the appeal. The appellant did not disclose before the learned trial Judge the reasons why he was not proceeding with the appeal and his attitude was one which was sufficient to raise suspicion as to his motives. The liquidator will have his costs of the appeal out of the assets of the Company.

Hindu Religious Endowments Board, Madras — Respondents.

Appeal No. 61 of 1932, Decided on 15th September 1937, against decree of Dist. Judge, Ganjam, in O. S. No. 10 of 1929.

(a) Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act (2 of 1927), S. 9 (5)—Excepted temple — Trusteeship in one family for four generations—Temple should be regarded as 'excepted' and trusteeship hereditary.

Where the office of a trustee has been held by the head of a family for four successive generations and there is no suggestion that the trusteeship had ever been held outside the family, the temple should be regarded as an excepted temple under S. 9 (5) and trusteeship as hereditary: 10 Mad 292 and 36 Mad 364, Rel. on. [P 99 C 2]

(b) Deed—Construction—Words importing hereditary character not imported in deed—Evidence of long enjoyment and descent—Hereditary character presumed.

Where in the deed words importing the hereditary character of the tenure are absent but it is supplied by evidence of long and uninterrupted enjoyment and by the descent of the tenure from the father to the son, it could be legally presumed that the tenure is of a hereditary character: 10 M I A 183 (P C) and 12 M I A 263 (P C), Rel. on. [P 100 C 1]

Leach C. J. — The appellants were the plaintiffs in the Court below. They claim that appellant 1 is the hereditary trustee of the Sri Radhakanta Mahaprabho temple of Bhavanipur. By an order dated 16th October 1928, the Board of Commissioners for Hindu Religious Endowments framed a scheme for the management of this temple under the provisions of S. 57, Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act, 1927. In spite of the contentions by the appellants to the contrary, the Board refused to recognize the temple as being an excepted temple within the meaning of S. 9 (5) of the Act and rejected the claim set up by the appellants that their family possessed the hereditary right of appointing a member as trustee of the temple. On this basis the Board decided that there should be a council of three trustees and placed the management of the temple in hands of this council. No member of the appellants' family was however appointed to this council of trustees. The appellants were not satisfied with the Board's decision and instituted the suit out of which this appeal arises, as they had the right to do under S. 57 (3) of the Act. The learned District Judge agreed with the findings of the Board of Commissioners and adopted the Board's scheme. He held that the hereditary right claimed had not been established; that the temple was not an excepted temple within the meaning of S. 9 (5) and therefore a scheme should be framed under S. 57; that the lands which the appellants claimed to be theirs were in fact temple lands; and that the appellants had been guilty of mismanagement of the temple while carrying out the duties of trustees. All these findings have been challenged before us.

It will be convenient to take the question relating to the lands first. It is quite clear in our opinion that these lands were not granted to the appellants' family, but have throughout been temple lands. There are two parcels of lands, one situate in the village of Bodogumala, and the other in the village of Bhawanipur where the temple is situate. The Bodogumala lands were granted to the temple some time prior to the inam settlement of 1862. The register of inams shows that the original grantee of the lands was the deity of this temple and the title deed which was granted by the inam commissioner on 3rd December 1862 was granted to the great-grandfather of the appellants as the manager for the time being of this temple. Para. 2 of the grant reads as follows:

> This inam is confirmed to you and your successors tax free to be held without interference so long as the conditions of the grant are duly fulfilled.

It will be observed that the grant was to the manager and to his successors and not to the great-grandfather of the appellants and his heirs. The register shows that the grant was given to the temple to defray the costs of daily pujas therein. In Col. 8, which is intended to contain the requisite information in the case of grants made for service, appear the words: "for the daily offerings of the deity service performed". It is on the strength of these words that the appellants contend that the grant was to their ancestors personally, subject to their defraying the cost of daily pujas in the temple. But this construction cannot be accepted in view of the fact that the register specifically states that the name of the original grantee is the deity of the temple and in face of the wording of the inam grant. We have no doubt that the appellants and their forefathers have regarded the Bodogumala village lands as their own and have so dealt with it. The fact that they have done so does not alter the fact that it was a grant to the temple and not to them. The title to the Bhavanipur lands is based on a patta granted in 1880 to the paternal uncle of appellant 1. It is not necessary to discuss whether the fact that this grant was in the paternal uncle's name makes any difference, because it is admitted by the learned advocate for the appellant that the Bhawanipur lands stand in the same position as the Bodogumala lands and if the Bodogumala lands are temple lands and not family lands, the Bhavanipur lands must also be regarded as temple lands. For these reasons we agree with findings of the learned trial Judge that the appellants' family does not possess any right of ownership.

With regard to the question whether appellant 1 is the hereditary trustee of the temple, we do not accept the finding of the learned trial Judge. It appears to us on the evidence read in the light of the authorities that the only conclusion open to the Court is the appellants' family does possess right of appointing the trustee of the temple, which means that it is an excepted temple. There is uncontradicted evidence that the management of this temple has been in the hands of the appellants' family for four generations. The trustee in 1862, that is at the time of the inam settlement, was their great grandfather and the office has been held by their paternal grandfather and by their father in succession. It has not been suggested that anyone outside the appellants' family has ever partaken in the management of the temple. That this justifies the conclusion that appellant 1 is the hereditary trustee is to be gathered from the decisions in 10 Mad 292[1] and 36 Mad 364.[2]

1. Ganapathi v. Sitharama, (1887) 10 Mad 292.
2. Ramdass v. Hanumantha Rao, (1913) 36 Mad 364=12 I C 449=21 M L J 952.

The case in 10 Mad 292[1] dealt with a claim to the office of karnam which had been held by the same family for three generations. The case in 36 Mad 364[2] related to temple lands and a question was raised whether the trusteeship was hereditary in the family of the plaintiff. The members of the family had held the office of trustee continuously for over a hundred years and there was no evidence that it was ever held by any other family. White C. J. and Phillips J. considered that this was sufficient to prove the hereditary right which had been set up. In 10 M I A 183,[3] their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the absence in the deed of words importing the hereditary character of the tenure was supplied by evidence of long and uninterrupted enjoyment and by the descent of the tenure from father to the son, and that from this hereditary character could be legally presumed. The same opinion was expressed by the Judicial Committee in 12 M I A 263.[4] We have in the case before us proof that the office has been held by the head of the appellants' family for four successive generations and that it is at present held by appellant 1 as the son of his father. Further, there is no suggestion that the trusteeship has ever been held outside the appellants' family. For these reasons we consider that the learned trial Judge was wrong in refusing to regard this as an excepted temple.

It is said however that the trial Court had the right to deprive appellant 1 of his trusteeship and vest the management of the temple in a board of trustees because appellant 1 and his brothers had been guilty of breach of trust. The alleged breaches of trust are: (1) the failure to keep accounts and (2) the mortgaging of the temple lands. It may be observed that there is no suggestion that the appellants or their forbears have improperly spent the income of these lands, and when the complaint was made against them that accounts had not been kept they took steps immediately to rectify this. In addition they have since discharged all the encumbrances on the temple properties. In these circumstances we are unable to concur in the opinion that there has been such mismanagement on the part of the appellants that the Court is justified in taking away the right of management which the family possesses.

This means that the scheme has been framed on a wrong basis. The learned advocate for the appellants does not object to a scheme being framed for the management of the temple, provided that appellant 1 is allowed to continue to be the trustee and the hereditary right is not interfered with. We have held that appellant 1 is entitled to be the trustee and that the family does possess the hereditary right of appointment. The scheme should provide for this. In view of the fact that the learned District Judge has placed the management of the temple in a board of trustees, it will be necessary for the scheme to be re-settled. The case will therefore be sent back to the District Judge for the re-settlement of the scheme in the light of this judgment. We direct each party to bear his own costs throughout.

R. C. Nagaraja Mooppanar — Respondent.

Appeal No. 505 of 1931, Decided on 3rd September 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Tanjore, D/- 5th October 1931.

Transfer of Property Act (1882 before amendment of 1929), S. 107—Lease of reversion upon existing term can be created—Such lease operates as assignment of reversion and entitles lessee to recover rent due under prior lease—Distinction between assignment of rents and profits and lease of reversion stated.

There is nothing in the Transfer of Property Act to preclude the lease of a reversion. If a document has mentioned simply that a lease of the lands which were also the subject matter of the prior lease is being granted, that would in law without anything more operate as an assignment of the reversion and entitle the lessee under the latter lease to recover the rent due and payable under the former lease. There is always a distinction between an assignment of the rents and profits and a lease of a reversion. In the case of an assignment of rents and profits, all that the assignee will be entitled to is the right to realise the rents and profits by virtue of the assignment in his favour, but in the case of a reversion, it is not merely the right to recover the rents and profits that are transferred to him but also the rights which the lessor had on the date of the reversion, for example, his right to recover possession immediately on the expiry of the previous term and if before the expiry of the term by virtue of any forfeiture, the lessor had the right to re-enter, the right of such re-entry.

T. R. Venkatarama Sastri for A. C. Sampath Iyengar and T. R. Srinivasa Iyer — for Appellants.

K. Raja Iyer for B. C. Seshachala Iyer —for Respondent.

Venkataramana Rao J. — This is an appeal from the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Tanjore awarding a sum of Rs. 12,942-8-3 in favour of the plaintiff. The suit was to recover arrears of rent on the basis of a lease, Ex. B, dated 25th December 1920, executed by defendant 1 in favour of one Seethalakshmi Ammal, the then proprietrix of Kapisthalam estate and defendants 2 and 3 are the undivided father and brother of defendant 1. The said lease was to run for ten Faslis commencing from Fasli 1333 to Fasli 1342. The lands comprised in the lease were about 59 acres 37 cents in the village of Sathyamangalam. Subsequent to the execution of this lease, on 23rd September 1925, the said Seethalakshmi Ammal gave a lease Ex. A in favour of the plaintiff of the whole of the Sathyamangalam village including the lands which had been leased under the prior lease of 1920. The latter lease was for ten Faslis from Fasli 1335 to Fasli 1344 and was to commence from Fasli 1335. The document was executed by the plaintiff in favour of Seethalakshmi Ammal. Not only did it comprise the lands which were the subject matter of the lease of 1920, it also included lands comprised under three other leases whose terms were outstanding. This lease deed was attested by defendant 1 in whose name the lease of 1920, Ex. B, had been executed. In and by the terms of the said document, Ex. A, the plaintiff was authorised to collect the lease paddy and cash rent due from all the lessees mentioned in the said document including the lease of 1920. This suit has been instituted for the recovery of arrears for Faslis 1335 to 1339 payable under Ex. B.

Two defences were urged by the defendants in answer to the plaintiff's claim. One was that the plaintiff had no right to sue for the recovery of the arrears of rent in the absence of any assignment executed by Seethalakshmi Ammal in his favour and the lease deed in favour of the plaintiff does not operate as such an assignment. The second defence was that on the date of the execution of the lease in favour of the plaintiff, Seethalakshmi Ammal was not in a sound state of mind ; therefore the lease must be deemed to be void and no rights accrued to the plaintiff thereunder. In regard to the first point, the contention of Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastriar is that once a lease has been executed for a term and it is outstanding, there can be no lease of the reversion, because such a lease would in law amount to a transfer of the rents and profits due and recoverable from the prior lessee and can only be done by an assignment executed by the lessor.

It seems to us that this contention is not sound. Under S. 107, T. P. Act (before the amendment) which governs this case, there can be a lease of immovable property by virtue of a registered document executed by the lessee in favour of the lessor : vide 35 Mad 95.[1] The subject matter of the lease must be immovable property and the immovable property may be actual land or may be a reversion upon an existing term. There is nothing in the Act to preclude the lease of a reversion. Under the English law it is open to a landlord to create concurrent leases, that is he can execute a lease today for a term and tomorrow he can execute another lease for another term to run from the date on which he executed the latter lease. Such a lease has always been held to be valid and in law would operate as an assignment upon the existing term : vide (1653) 78 E R 410.[2] There is nothing to preclude the application of this principle to India and it has been adopted by the Indian High Courts : vide 33 M L J 684.[3] Therefore the question is, "would Ex. A be a valid lease according to the Transfer of Property Act ?" It is conceded that it is. If Ex. A had mentioned simply that a lease of the lands which were also the subject matter of the prior lease is being granted, that would in law without anything more operate as an assignment of the reversion and entitle the lessee under the latter lease to recover

On a construction of the plaint document, the intention is clear that there should be a lease of the reversion ; in fact all the rights and obligations which the lessor had at the date of the lease were intended to be leased to plaintiff and the lease is not a bare assignment of the rents and profits in which case probably, as Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastriar contends, such an assignment would be an assignment of an actionable claim within the meaning of S. 130, T. P. Act, and therefore require a transfer in writing signed by the transferor. But the present document Ex. A is not a bare assignment of the rents and profits and it is not logical or possible in this case to treat the right to recover profits and rents apart from other rights and obligations which the lessor had on the date of the lease. There is always a distinction between an assignment of the rents and profits and a lease of a reversion. In the case of an assignment of rents and profits, all that the assignee will be entitled to is the right to realize the rents and profits by virtue of the assignment in his favour, but in the case of a reversion it is not merely the right to recover the rents and profits that are transferred to him but also the rights which the lessor had on the date of the reversion, for example, his right to recover possession immediately on the expiry of the previous term and if before the expiry of the term by virtue of any forfeiture, the lessor had the right to re-enter, the right of such re-entry.

We are therefore clearly of the opinion that Ex. A is a lease of the reversion upon the existing term under Ex. B in regard to the suit property and the plaintiff is therefore entitled to realise the rents and profits for the Faslis in question. In regard to the second point, the only evidence that has been relied on is an alleged admission of the plaintiff in his deposition to the effect that he presented an application in 1926 to the Court of Wards requesting them to take possession of the Kapisthalam estate on the ground that Seethalakshmi Ammal, the proprietrix, was not in a sound state of mind and had been so for a period of two years before the date of the application, but what he says in that deposition is that she was not in a sound state of mind now and then and not continuously. But in order to invalidate the suit document, it must be established that on the date of its execution in September 1925, Seethalakshmi Ammal was not in a sound state of mind and there is no evidence whatever on this point. Mr. Venkatarama Sastriar requests us to admit the application which the present plaintiff preferred to the Court of Wards as additional evidence in this case. The defendants had ample time to make that application to the lower Court and no explanation has been given for their delay in not doing so and we are not inclined to entertain this request at this stage. No other point was argued before us. Therefore on the evidence on record, the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge that Seethalaksmi Ammal was in a sound state of mind on the date of the lease in favour of the plaintiff must be affirmed. In the result, the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Krishnaswami — Respondent.

Appeal No. 21 of 1936, Decided on 4th August 1937, from the judgment of Lakshmana Rao J. D/. 12th February 1936.

Hindu Law—Partition—Setting aside — S and G constituting joint Hindu family — S out of self-acquired income paying all family debts — Partition between S and G — G in consideration of services rendered by S, conveying moiety of his share to S in addition to S's legal share — Transaction so far as it affected G's share held could not be challenged by G's son.

S and G constituted a joint Hindu family. The family estate was burdened with debts and S out of his separate and self-acquired income paid all the debts and made some improvements to the ancestral property. Subsequently S and G decided to partition the family estate and in the partition deed, G, in consideration of the services rendered by S to the family estate, agreed to convey, and in fact conveyed, a moiety of his share to S in addition to what S was legally entitled to get in the family estate. The son of G instituted a suit challenging the transaction and claiming the share paid to S in excess of his share :

Held that on equitable principles, the son of G was not entitled to tear up the transfer deed so far as it affected his father's share : Case law discussed. [P 105 C 1, 2]

K. Rajah Ayyar and K. E. Rajagopalachari — for Appellants.

K. S. Krishnaswamy Ayyangar and C. Narasimhachariar — for Respdt.

Leach C. J.—The appellants are sons of one Gopala Bhattachariar who died in the year 1931. Gopala who was the son of one Manavala Iyengar was born after his father's death which took place in 1888. Three years before he died Manavala adopted Srinivasa Bhattachariar, defendant 1 in the suit out of which this appeal arises. Srinivasa died during the pendency of the suit and he is now represented by the respondent. Srinivasa and Gopala remained joint until 1923 when a partition of the family estate was effected. At this time Gopala had one son, appellant 1, then a boy of five years of age. By the deed of partition which was dated 30th March 1923, the family estate was divided equally between Srinivasa and Gopala, notwithstanding that Srinivasa being an adopted son was only entitled in law to a one-fifth share. No question with regard to the validity of the transaction was raised during Gopala's lifetime, but in the month after his death the suit was launched by the widow as the next friend of the appellants who were then all minors. Appellant 1 has since come of age. The appellants contend that they are entitled to recover from the estate of Srinivasa the difference between the share he received and the one-fifth share allowed by law. The suit was tried by Lakshmana Rao J. who decided that in the circumstances of the case, Gopala was justified in giving a moiety of the estate to Srinivasa on partition. At the time of Manavala's death the estate consisted of about 80 acres of land. He was financially involved and it was necessary to sell a portion of the land to relieve pressure by a creditor. In a good year the income from the lands did not amount to more than Rs. 1,300 and the only other source of income which the family had was a half share in the chinna murai of the Sri Parthasarathy Temple, Madras. The income from this half share of the chinna murai did not amount to more than Rs. 40 per mensem and in all probability to much less; but whatever the exact figure was, it is clear that the joint income was not sufficient to provide for the maintenance of the family, the upkeep of the family properties and the discharge of the family debts.

On 3rd March 1903, the owners of the peria murai gave Srinivasa a power of attorney authorizing him to supervise the collections in the temple to which they were entitled with power to appoint others to assist him in his work. For these services he was to be paid Rs. 10 per mensem. Srinivasa himself took an active part in collecting monetary offerings from worshippers and it is common ground that he was entitled to retain a percentage of the amounts actually collected by him. His earnings in this respect are said to have amounted to about Rs. 40 per mensem, in addition to the Rs. 10 mentioned in the power of attorney.

But it is a legitimate inference from the proved facts in this case that his personal income was not limited to this Rs. 50 per mensem and he must have received much more by way of gifts from wealthy people interested in the temple. Srinivasa held this power of attorney for 20 years and it is very significant that 12 months after he obtained it, borrowings on behalf of the family ceased. The significance does not stop there. During the period for which Srinivasa held this power of attorney, the family debts were all paid off, improvements were made to the ancestral house, a second house was built and three small plots of land were purchased. This could only have been done out of moneys which Srinivasa acquired as the result of the position which he held as the agent of the owners of the peria murai, and this is in effect acknowledged in the deed of partition itself. It cannot be gainsaid that the family income alone was insufficient to do all this and Gopala who was a minor up to 1906 had no separate income of his own, apart from what he earned as a gumastha under Srinivasa, which could not have amounted to much. The position, therefore, was that Gopala had to thank Srinivasa for removing the oppression of debt and reviving the prosperity of the family. In these circumstances it is not surprising, when it was decided to put an end to the joint family status and partition the family estate, that Gopala agreed to Srinivasa having a half share instead of one fifth. The recitals in the deed of partition show that Gopala realized how much he owed to Srinivasa. These recitals read as follows :

> Whereas both of us were living hitherto in one joint family, and whereas, in view of certain inconveniences it is now deemed fit to effect a partition and live separately, and whereas the moveable and immovable properties belonging to us in common and mentioned hereunder belonging to us both as our ancestral property and self-acquired property, which are in our possession and enjoyment are most of them acquired and improved to a great extent by Srinivasa Iyengar alone, the adopted son amongst us, under the patronage of great men. . . . .

The reference to the patronage of great men has been interpreted as meaning that as the result of coming into contact with wealthy worshippers Srinivasa received substantial gratuities, and no alternative interpretation has been suggested. The learned trial Judge had no reason to doubt the truth of the recitals and on the basis that Srinivasa had discharged the family debts held the partition deed to be valid. The learned advocate for the appellants challenges the correctness of this decision. He says that because Srinivasa threw into the common fund his own individual income, thereby providing moneys for the discharge of the family debts and the improvement of the estate, he had no claim in law to a greater share than one-fifth on partition. He had blended his own moneys with those of the family. There is certainly no evidence to show when the debts were paid off and there is no evidence that Srinivasa ever made a claim to be repaid any moneys spent by him for the benefit of the family, or any evidence that he had ever made any stipulation for repayment. Therefore, if the case rested here, there would be much to be said for the argument of the learned advocate for the appellants. The defendants in their written statement supported the partition deed on the ground that Srinivasa had done much for Gopala, and that therefore Gopala was entitled to do what he did. Before us it was also supported on the ground that it was in the nature of a family arrangement, but unfortunately for this argument there is no evidence that it was entered into in order to settle a family dispute or to avoid the expense or delay of litigation, or that there was, in fact, any real necessity for giving Srinivasa a larger share. But as it is true that Srinivasa had rendered services of real value to Gopala, I think that the deed can be supported. Gopala had by a registered deed in effect conveyed his share in the family property to Srinivasa in consequence of these services and as appellant 1 has received his individual share in the family estate in full, he cannot be allowed to repudiate the transaction. The other appellants were not born at the time and standing alone have no right to challenge the transaction.

Here it will be convenient to examine some of the authorities which have been quoted to us in the course of the arguments. The first of these is that in 33 Bom 267.[1] A perusal of the report in that case shows that their Lordships of the Privy Council had at an earlier stage dealt with the validity of a deed whereby a son in consideration of a monetary payment by the father relinquished his own share in the ancestral property, and that at a later stage the Bombay High Court held that this operated to prevent a son born subsequently from having any claim to share in the property. There was here however no express transfer by the son to the father and the facts differ to that extent. I will now turn to the series of connected decisions to be found in 26 M L T 460,[2] 1917 M W N 30[3] and 43 M L J 298.[4] One Venkata Row, who died in 1871, had four sons, Ramachandra Row, Luchman Row, Rajaram Row, and Tuljaram Row. After the dissolution of the family in 1881, a large part of the family property remained in the hands of Tuljaram Row. In 1886, Atmaram, the son of Luchman, brought a suit for the purpose of ascertaining what the assets in the hands of Tuljaram Row were and for the recovery of his share. In the course of this case it was held that Tuljaram Row was liable to Rajaram Row and his branch of the family in certain sums of money. Rajaram on behalf of his branch agreed to release Tuljaram from payment of these moneys in consideration of Tuljaram agreeing not to appeal. In other words, Rajaram gave up his own and his son's rights without any struggle. On the son attaining majority he filed a suit to enforce his rights.

This suit failed both in the trial Court and in this Court on appeal, but the case was carried to the Privy Council where it was held that the compromise not having received the sanction of the Court was not binding on Rajaram's son who was a minor at the time. The agreement did not purport to be a release of individual rights nor to effect any division of the joint family property ; it only purported to release the debts owing to Rajaram's branch of the family in consideration of Tuljaram refraining from appealing. The case was then sent back for re-trial on the other issues. On the remand this Court decided that the compromise was binding to the extent of the father's share. Another appeal followed to the Privy Council which held that the agreement entered into by Rajaram Row did not purport to be a release of individual rights or shares in the fund at all, and it did not purport to effect any division of the joint family estate then existing between Rajaram Row and his son in the subject matter of the decrees. Their Lordships accordingly held that Rajaram Row's attempt to alienate, or to release, from the estate substantial portions of the joint family property failed, and that there was no efficacy given to the arrangement that was then contemplated. But the case before us goes further than this. Gopala did in fact execute in favour of Srinivasa a transfer of half the property and put him into possession of it.

In 59 M L J 139[5] it was pointed out that the compromise there did not purport to alienate the father's share alone but the whole of the family interest in the property and therefore was not binding on the family. It was recognized however that when such an alienation has been effected, the Court will enforce an equity in favour of the alienee to the extent of the alienor's share, though it does not follow that the Court will enforce such a compromise before the equity has in fact arisen. In 19 M L J 62[6] it was held that a gift by a member of a joint Hindu family made in consideration of past services voluntarily rendered to the family would not bind any of the members of the family other than the donor, without proof that they were for family necessity or for family benefit; but it would be binding on the donor himself as one made for consideration received. In that case it was pressed upon the Court that past services voluntarily rendered would not amount to consideration to support a promise, but the Court held that it did not follow that the services were not of value when set against an alienation. The services rendered were in fact capable of valuation and the defendant had valued them and paid for them by the transfer. This is exactly the case here. It seems to me that in the circumstances of this case the Court, exercising as it does jurisdiction in equity, is entitled to say that appellant 1 shall not be allowed to tear up the transfer deed so far as it affects his father's share. For these reasons I think the decree passed by the learned trial Judge was a correct one. The appeal will accordingly be dismissed with costs.

Varadachariar J. — I agree and shall only add a few observations on the points of law argued before us. The conclusion of the learned trial Judge that the facts which he found proved 'would unquestionably justify the equal division' between the two brothers seems to me, with all respect, open to criticism. On behalf of the appellants it was contended, with some justification, that when under the law Srinivasa was only entitled to a fourth of Gopala's share, the facts that Srinivasa (who was the family manager) had by his labours or even with the aid of his self-acquisitions improved the family properties or paid off its debts would not entitle him to claim a larger share. The learned Government Pleader (who appeared for the respondent) sought to support the lower Court's conclusion as a finding based on the principles applied in favour of family settlements; and he relied in this connexion on the decisions in 12 Bom L R 621,[7] 36 Mad 151[8] and 30 M L J 308.[9] The grounds on which 'family settlements' are supported are well established; but in applying to a case like the present, observations in judgments dealing with family settlements, there is an obvious distinction, which ought not to be lost sight of, between cases in which the question of validity arises only as between the parties to the transaction and those in which it is sought to bind by the transaction persons who were only represented therein by one of the parties thereto. This distinction is material when it is sought to bind Hindu reversioners or minor co-parceners in a joint family by transactions entered into by a widow or an undivided father. In this latter class of cases, it will not be enough merely to prove that the transaction was intended to secure peace and harmony in the family or the preservation of its property and that it was not tainted by fraud or similar vitiating circumstances.

In 40 Cal 966,[10] the sons of a Hindu father impeached an arrangement under which the father had allotted a share in the family property to one who claimed to be a co-parcener as the result of an adoption. The sons contended that there had been no valid adoption ; but the Courts in India, without trying this question, upheld the allotment on the ground that in the absence of any allegation of fraud or collusion, the sons would be bound by their father's act as 'the arrangement was in the nature of a compromise of a claim either disputed or which might have been disputed.' The Judicial Committee remanded the case for further investigation, observing that if on a partition a share is given to a stranger (which the respondent would have been but for the alleged adoption) 'the partition may be impeached as a disposition of property made without consideration unless it can be supported as a bona fide compromise of a disputed claim.' I see no difference in principle between the allotment of a share to a person who has no legal claim and the allotment to an admitted co-parcener of a share far in excess of his legal claim. The cases relied on by the respondent's learned counsel will on examination be found to satisfy the test indicated in the extract above quoted. In the present case the respondent's father raised a plea on the same lines in the written statement; but the respondent did not seriously attempt to establish it at the trial. I am therefore of opinion that the partition under Ex. I cannot as such be held binding on the plaintiff's branch.

The respondent is however entitled to succeed on another ground. Gopala had only one son at the date of the partition and his own share would then have been 2/5th of the whole estate. If on any grounds recognized by law, Srinivasa could be held to have become entitled at least to that share, the respondent can insist on maintaining the division under Ex. I, because Srinivasa has not thereby obtained more than his own 1/5th plus the 2/5th share of Gopala. On this footing, plaintiffs 2 and 3 who were not in existence on the date of Ex. I cannot claim any right to disturb the arrangement under Ex. I: 33 Bom 267.[1] It has been held in some decisions of this Court, 11 Mad 406[11] and 27 M L J 272,[12] that it is open to one co-parcener to relinquish his share to another co-parcener individually and that no pecuniary consideration is necessary to validate such relinquishment. It is however difficult to read into Ex. I an intention on the part of Gopala to relinquish or transfer his share as such. The decision of the Judicial Committee in 45 Mad 298[4] is an authority against reading any such intention into the document : (see also 59 M L J 139[5]). But, as recognized in 59 M L J 139,[5] there is another class of cases in which, though the father's transaction is not valid in law and did not distinguish his own share from that of his son, the law will split the transaction and on grounds of equity hold the father's transferee entitled to stand in his transferor's shoes and claim the share which he could have got if a partition between the transferor and his son had taken place at the date of the transfer. That this principle of equity may be invoked even in connexion with transactions in the nature of a partition was recognized by the Judicial Committee in 40 Cal 966[10] already referred to. On page 981 their Lordships observe that as between Kedarnath and Jainarain, > it may well be that the latter may be entitled to insist that he stands in the shoes of the former as to the share which would come to Kedarnath on a partition ; and that the Court, if that position were established, would itself, at Jainarain's instance decree a partition as between the plaintiffs on the one hand and Kedarnath on the other.

As pointed out in 59 M L J 139[5], this principle of equity can be invoked only when there is a completed transfer by the father and the transfer is not gratuitous. In 45 Mad 298[4] the Courts in India had applied this principle but the Judicial Committee reversed that decision because in their Lordships' opinion the facts of the case did not warrant its application. In the present case, Mr. Rajah Iyer (the learned counsel for the appellants) sought to exclude that principle on the ground that the transfer of the excess share under Ex. I was gratuitous. He contended that as Srinivasa must be deemed to have 'blended' his self-acquisitions with the joint family property, the whole property that was divided under Ex. I had become joint property and there was accordingly no independent consideration moving from Srinivasa. This question of 'blending' was not distinctly raised by the plaintiffs at any stage of the case and the limitations governing such a plea are indicated in the recent judgment of the Privy Council in (1937) 2 M L J 114.[13] Even on the evidence as it stands, there is nothing to support the theory of 'blending' so far as the house in the village is concerned. Further, assuming for the sake of argument that Srinivasa could not have enforced at law a claim to retain any portion of the properties as his self-acquisition, that will not by itself exclude the equities arising on a transfer for value. That in entering into the arrangement embodied in Ex. I, Gopala acted—and rightly acted — on the footing that he had greatly benefited at the expense of Srinivasa, is clearly established by the evidence. This, in my opinion, is sufficient to entitle Srinivasa to the benefit of the equitable principle above referred to : (see 19 M L J 62[6]). As the transfer had been completed by Ex. I, and the rights of the parties have to be determined as on the date of Ex. I, the death of Gopala before the institution of this suit or the death of Srinivasa pending the suit can make no difference.

Second Appeal No. 343 of 1933, Decided on 19th August 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Dindigul, in A. S. No. 59 of 1932.

Mahomedan Law — Dower—Madras Presidency — Dower not postponed by agreement —Presumption is that entire dower is prompt and payable on demand.

Unless payment of the whole or any part of dower is expressly postponed, it must be presumed to be prompt and payable on demand. This is the rule of law governing all Mahomedans without any distinction so far as Madras Presidency is concerned : 38 Mad 371 (F B), Explained; 19 W R 315 (P C), Rel. on; A I R 1929 Pat 207 and 33 All 291, Not foll. [P 110 C 2; P 111 C 1]

Venkataramana Rao J.—Three points have been argued by Mr. Rajah Iyer in this second appeal, one relating to a question of fact and the other two relating to questions of law. The question of fact relates to the genuineness of Ex. F which is the document on which the suit claim for dower is based. There is a concurrent finding of both the Courts that Ex. F is genuine, and it is not open to Mr. Rajah Iyer to challenge it in second appeal. The second point urged before me is that as the contract Ex. F does not fix any time for payment of the dower and as the parties are governed by Hanafi law, part of the dower must be presumed to be prompt and part deferred, and that the view of the lower Court following 35 Bom 386[1] is not correct. It is admitted that the parties to this suit are Hanafis. The text-writers on Mahomedan Law seem to make a distinction between the Shia law and the Hanafi law in regard to the payment of dower where the contract does not fix the time for payment. In Shia law the presumption seems to be that in the absence of a contract fixing the time for payment, the dower is prompt and payable on demand; but in Hanafi law the presumption seems to be otherwise. In 8 Pat 645[2] at page 649, Das J. states the rule of law thus :

> It seems to be well settled that amongst the Sunnis, where it is not settled at the time of the marriage whether the wife's dower is to be prompt or deferred, part will be prompt and part deferred, the proportion referable to each category being regulated by custom or in the absence of custom by the status of the parties and the amount of dower settled.

According to the learned Judge, the presumption will apply even in a case where an agreement is set up but is not substantiated. This seems to be the view also of the Allahabad High Court in 33 All 291.[3] But Mr. Panchapakesa Sastri contends that so far as this Presidency is concerned, no such distinction is drawn between Shia law and Hanafi law, and the Full Bench in 23 Mad 371[4] must be deemed to have laid down the law for all Mahomedans. According to the said decision, unless payment of the whole or any part is expressly postponed, it must be presumed to be prompt and payable on demand. It is not clear from the judgment or from a reference to the printed papers whether the parties were Shias and/or Sunnis. In the argument of Mr. K. Srinivasa Iyengar for the appellant before the Full Bench there is a statement to the effect that he contended that the parties were Shias. At any rate both the Allahabad and the Patna High Courts are inclined not to treat that case as laying down any rule of Hanafi law but that the principle of that decision must be confined to Shias. I may observe that the decision in 23 Mad 371[4] purports to follow a decision of the Privy Council in 19 W R 315,[5] where the parties were Shias. It is not clear from the Full Bench decision whether it is intended to govern all classes of Mahomedans, whether Shias or Hanafis. In view of the decisions of the Allahabad and Patna High Courts which have taken a definite view on this matter, it is desirable that there should be an authoritative ruling whether the decision of the Full Bench in 23 Mad 371[4] was intended to lay down the law for all Mahomedans whether Shias or Sunnis. I accordingly refer the matter to a Bench for disposal. The other point raised by Mr. Rajah Iyer relates to the question of interest. This matter also will be disposed of by the Bench dealing with the second appeal.

Judgment.

Burn J.—The facts are all set forth in the judgment of my learned brother which I have had the advantage of perusing. Since I agree with his conclusions, it is not necessary for me to say more than a few words upon the subject for decision in this appeal. The point upon which our learned brother Venkataramana Rao J. felt some doubt was whether the Full Bench in disposing of the case, 23 Mad 371,[4] intended to lay down the law for all Mahomedans whether Shias or Sunnis. If it did, there is no question about the binding nature of the decision so far as we are concerned, and since the decision is now 37 years old I should be very reluctant to suggest that it requires reconsideration, whatever the nature of the decisions in other provinces might be. I do not think there is any room for doubt upon this matter. The order of reference to a Full Bench which gave occasion for the decision reported in 23 Mad 371[4] states simply that the parties were "Mahomedans". It goes on to state that this Court in 6 M H C R 9[6] held that "according to Mahomedan law dower is presumed to be prompt in the absence of express contract." The ground of this decision was stated to be that "the authorities agreed that there was a presumption of Mahomedan law to this effect". Later in the order of reference the learned Judges draw attention to Ameer Ali's work on Mahomedan Law in which a distinction is made between the Shia law and the Hanafi doctrines. Nevertheless, in the opinion delivered by the Full Bench there is no reference to any difference between Hanafi doctrine and Shia doctrine. It cannot be presumed that the learned Judges overlooked the reference to Ameer Ali's work and the only conclusion I can draw from their opinion is that they deemed themselves to be laying down the law for all Mahomedans irrespective of sect.

There is undoubtedly a divergence of view between Macnaghten and Baillie in those parts of their treatises in which they were propounding the principles of Hanafi law. There was not, I believe, at any time any question about Shia doctrine on this point. According to Shia law the whole dower is prompt when the contract is silent. I agree with my learned brother that the remark attributed to Mr. K. Srinivasa Iyengar in the report of his argument in 23 Mad 371[4], "these parties are Shias," must be the result of incorrect reporting. If the parties had been Shias, the contention put forward on their behalf could never have arisen. Macnaghten and Baillie differed. This Court in 6 M H C R 9[6] (which was a case affecting Shafis, i. e. Sunnis) followed Macnaghten in preference to Baillie and their Lordships of the Privy Council in 19 W R 315[5] expressed the opinion that the view laid down in Macnaghten's Principles was "the admitted rule". I am quite clear that we should do nothing now to indicate any doubt about the correctness of the decision in 23 Mad 371.[4] On the question of interest, no sufficient reason was shown for interference with the decree of the lower Court. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Abdur Rahman J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by one Aiyesha Bivi for the recovery of her dower amounting to Rs. 2,000 and for subsequent interest. The suit was filed on the basis of a deed of dower which was silent on the point whether the dower was prompt or deferred. It was alleged on behalf of the plaintiff however that as the deed was silent on the point, the dower should be presumed to be prompt and in any case there was a communal custom prevailing to that effect in the Nallam Pillai community. In answer to this claim, her husband defendant 2 pleaded that the deed filed on behalf of the plaintiff was a forgery and that a sum of 2,000 tangas (a tanga being 1/3rd of a rupee) was fixed as a dower between the parties and was so entered in a document which had also provided that the whole of the dower was deferred in character. It was also pleaded that the aforesaid dower of 2,000 tangas, i. e. Rs. 667 was, although deferred, already paid to the plaintiff. In the alternative it was pleaded that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any mahr during the continuance of the nikah and that there was no custom which would entitle her to claim it before dissolution of marriage.

Finding that the plea of payment raised on behalf of the defendants was not substantiated and that the deed of dower relied upon by the plaintiff was a genuine document, the trial Court did not give an explicit finding on the custom alleged on behalf of the plaintiff but referring to the question of law it was stated that the view taken by the Bombay High Court was probably the more correct view. He therefore found that the whole of the dower was payable on demand and decreed the claim. Aggrieved by this order the defendants filed an appeal to the Subordinate Judge at Dindigul who went into questions of facts carefully but disposed of the question of law with a statement that according to the Bombay High Court, if the document was silent on the point when the dower was to be paid, it should be taken to be payable at once.

Not being satisfied with the orders of the trial and the lower Appellate Court, the defendants came up to the High Court. The appeal was heard in the first instance by my learned brother Venkataramana Rao J. who came to the conclusion that the genuineness of the deed of dower could not be challenged in the second appeal. But in view of a Full Bench decision of this Court given in 23 Mad 371,[4] which followed a decision of the Privy Council in 19 W R 315[5] on the one hand and divergent views taken particularly by the High Courts of Allahabad and Patna in the rulings cited below on the other, 1 All 483,[7] 1 All 506,[8] 33 All 291[3] and 8 Pat 645,[2] he considered it desirable to refer the case for an authoritative ruling, and the case has consequently been sent to a Bench of this Court for disposal. This was done particularly as some doubt existed on the question whether the Madras Full Bench case and the Privy Council case, both of which have been cited above, intended to lay down the law for all Mahomedans whether of Shia or Sunni persuasion or only for Mahomedans of the Shia sect alone. This doubt was natural as the Privy Council decision was given in the case of certain members of the ruling house of Oudh who were Shias and although there was nothing to show on the records of the Madras Full Bench case printed in 23 Mad 371[4] that the parties were Shias, a statement has been printed as having been made by Mr. K. Srinivasa Iyengar, counsel for the appellant, that the parties to that suit were Shias. This is surprising as this statement is preceded by the words "Syed Amir Ali in his work on 'Mahomedan Law', Vol. 2 at p. 386, draws a distinction between Shias and Hanafis". If the counsel for the appellant in that case were alive, as he must have been, to the distinction pointed out by Syed Amir Ali, which laid down that under the Shia law where no time was specified for the payment of the dower or where its nature was described only in general terms and it was not mentioned in the contract of marriage how much was prompt and how much deferred, the whole was to be considered as prompt. Mr. Srinivasa Iyengar was contending for the appellant in that case that the dower in Mahomedan law, if not specified to be prompt, could not be presumed to be so. He is then stated to have cited in support of his contention the following words out of Baillie's Digest of Mahomedan Law:

7. Eidan v. Mazhar Husain, (1885) 1 All 483.
8. Taufik-un-nissa v. Ghulam Kambar, (1885) 1 All 506.

When the parties have explained how much of the dower is to be mooujjul or prompt, that part of it is to be promptly paid. When nothing has been said on the subject, both the woman and the dower mentioned in the contract are to be taken into consideration with the view of determining how much of such a dower should properly be prompt for such a woman and so much is to be mooujjul or prompt accordingly, without any reference to the proportion of a fourth or a fifth, but what is customary must also be taken into consideration.

If the parties to the suit were on the other hand Shias, Baillie's Digest of Mahomedan Law, Vol. 1, which deals with the law amongst Sunnis, would not have been quoted at all, particularly when the counsel had, as pointed above, admitted that in the case of Shias the presumption would be otherwise. It might be stated here that Baillie discusses the Imamea law in Vol. 2 of his work. The contention that Mr. Srinivasa Iyengar could not have made such a statement in 23 Mad 371[4] was also supported by the counsel for respondent by a reference to Wilson's Mahomedan Law, who has pointed out that an admission of that nature would have been fatal to the appellant's case (pp. 118, 119, Edn. 5). I have gone through the records of the case printed in 23 Mad 371[4] and find nothing there which would show that the parties to the suit were Shias. In view of what has been said, I have no hesitation in finding that the statement imputed to Mr. Srinivasa Iyengar to the effect that the parties to that suit were Shias and printed at page 375 of 23 Mad 371,[4] could not have been made by him. On the other hand, a reference to the other authorities which were cited by the Division Bench in referring the case to the Full Bench for decision and those which were cited before the Full Bench leads me to conclude that the Full Bench was dealing with a case between persons who were of Sunni persuasion, and not those who followed the Imamea law.

As for the decision given by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 19 W R 315[5], it is true that the parties to that suit must be presumed to have been Shias as the ruling family of Oudh was a Shia family. But a reference to the judgment in that case shows that their Lordships of the Judicial Committee did not, while considering this question, refer to Shia texts but to those which were applicable to Sunnis. There is nothing to show in fact that they intended to differentiate between the two schools of thought. The observations which they made in that case were wholly general in character. It would thus follow that the Full Bench case reported in 23 Mad 371[4] is binding on us and is really based on the observations made by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 19 W R 315,[5] in which they preferred to follow the law as laid down in Macnaghten's Principles and Precedents, Chap. 7, Art. 22, to the effect that :

Where it may not have been expressed whether the payment of the dower is to be prompt or deferred, it must be held that the whole is due on demand.

Had the Full Bench case not been based on the law laid down by the Privy Council, it would have been necessary to consider whether in view of the pronouncements of the learned Judges of Allahabad and Patna High Courts, based as they are on the dicta of the learned authors like Baillie and Ameer Ali, it would not be advisable to refer the case to another Full Bench. But in view of the conclusions arrived at by me, I do not feel called upon to do so. Moreover, while examining the original authorities referred to by Mr. Ameer Ali and Baillie, I came across an original text from Hammadeyah—a work of great authority and fully recognized to be so amongst the Sunni Mussalmans in India—in which the position of the law has been stated as described by Macnaghten in his Principles of Mahomedan Law. I find at page 89 of the first volume of Hammadeyah, 1825 edition :

Summal-mahre la yakhlu amma in-yakuna be-shart-it-tajila au be-shart-it-tajila au maskutan anhu amma iza kana be-shart-it-tajila au maskutan anhu fa-innahu yajib fil-hale moujjil le-inna haza aqdun moawezatun fa-yaqtazal-masawat fij-janebaine fal-marat aiyanat haqqaz-zauje fa-wajib in-yataaine haqqaha wa innama yataaine bit-laslim. [transliteration].

Rendered into English, it would read as follows :

The dower is not free then from one condition and other. It would either be with a condition of immediate payment (i. e. moujjil) or with a condition of its being deferred (movajjal) or it may be silent. But if it is with a condition of immediate payment or is silent, it would become immediately payable (muajjal) for it is a contract with consideration and is therefore required to be equal on both the sides. As the woman (wife) has established the husband's right, it is essential that he (husband) may establish hers and this would be established on payment.

The learned author then proceeds to refer to expressly deferred dower with which we are not concerned here. It is true that Mr. Ameer Ali has based his opinion on Fatawa Alamgiri, which relies for its authority on a passage from Fatawa Kazi Khan. I have consulted both these original authorities and find that the statement of the law as given by them has been correctly put down by Mr. Ameer Ali in his well-known work at page 499, Vol. 2, and by Baillie in his Digest at page 127, Edn. 1875. But the fact remains that Hammadeyah lays it down differently and this view of law was propounded by Macnaghten and recognized by the Privy Council in 19 W R 315[5] and followed subsequently by this High Court in 23 Mad 371.[4] This rule of law is more commendable as it makes it more exact and workable in practice and fits in with the advancing state of society which gives more rights to helpless ladies in getting what they do not generally get on account of their dower—a liability which flows from the contract of marriage and which was, although generally discharged previously yet from which the husbands have latterly tried to escape in spite of a contract of which they have taken full advantage themselves.

As in 23 Mad 371[4], the defendants in this case appear to have entertained the view themselves that the dower was payable on demand as in spite of the plea that it was deferred, they pleaded payment of the whole sum and thus, as pointed out in 23 Mad 371[4], showed that their consciousness that it ought to have been so paid. At all events, it would be dangerous to go back upon or overrule decisions which are not manifestly erroneous. They have stood the test of time and must be deemed to have influenced a majority of Mahomedans —living in this Presidency at least—into a belief that if the character of dower is not specified, it would be taken to be prompt. The question of interest was not seriously contested and there is no reason why the plaintiff should not get it at the rate allowed by the lower Court, when she has been deprived of the use of her dower for such a long time, although it has been found to have been payable to her on demand. For the reasons given I would dismiss the appeal with costs throughout.

Second Appeal No. 440 of 1935, Decided on 2nd December 1936, against decree of Sub-Judge, Chingleput, in A. S. No. 30 of 1934.

Limitation Act (1908), S. 21 (2) — A and B each purchasing half share in mortgaged property from original mortgagors— Mortgagee accepting payment by B in full satisfaction of amount due by him—Subsequent suit by mortgagee against A—S. 21 (2) held applied and payment by B could not be relied upon to save limitation against A.

Two persons A and B purchased approximately one-half of the hypotheca from the original mortgagors. Judgment.—The only question for decision in this appeal is whether the payment of the suit mortgage on 16th November 1926 by defendant 13 saved limitation as against defendant 12. The learned District Munsif held that it did not and the learned Subordinate Judge, disagreeing with him, held that it furnished the start of a fresh period of limitation and that therefore the suit was not barred. Defendants 13 and 12 are purchasers from the original mortgagors. Defendant 11 had purchased a portion of the hypotheca before and defendants 12 and 13 purchased one-half of the rest. Defendant 11 was exonerated during the trial and with regard to defendant 13, it was found by the learned District Munsif—and the learned Subordinate Judge agreed—that the payment made by him on 16th November 1926 was accepted by the mortgagee in full satisfaction of the mortgagee's claim against defendant 13. The learned Subordinate Judge says :

Was the amount received by plaintiff from defendant 13 in full satisfaction of the claim so far as he is concerned or no ? I find that plaintiff received it in full quit in view of the language of

Ex. A-1 (which is the endorsement of payment). I agree with the District Munsif on the point. It would therefore, be inequitable to allow plaintiff to proceed against defendant 13 again from whom the full amount which he had agreed to pay by his sale deed with interest has been received.

the learned Subordinate Judge goes on to say,

Now, it has been held by two Benches of this Court, vide 55 I C 763,[1] and 53 Mad 119,[2] that the expression 'joint contractors' in S. 21 (2), Lim. Act, includes co-mortgagors. Defendants 12 and 13 in this suit are, as I have already said, purchasers of approximately one-half of the hypotheca from the original mortgagors, each purchased the share belonging to one of the original mortgagors. In view of this fact and also in view of the finding that the mortgagee definitely accepted the payment made by defendant 13 in full quit of what was due by him, it is peculiarly appropriate in my opinion to say in this case that defendants 12 and 13 are joint contractors within the meaning of S. 21 (2). This is a case in which not only by construction or implication but in actual fact the purchasers have taken over the contract made by the original mortgagors with the mortgagee. My attention has been drawn to the case in 56 M L J 630,[3] which was referred to in the case in A I R 1930 Mad 738.[4] In the first case Thiruvenkatachariar J. held that co-heirs of a single debtor are not 'joint contractors' within the meaning of S. 21 (2), Lim. Act, and in the latter case Curgenven J. held that the descendants of a deceased mortgagee are not joint contractors. The facts of the present case are however quite different. It is quite intelligible that co-heirs of a single debtor should not be held to be joint contractors with the original creditor, and in the case decided by Curgenven J. there is nothing to indicate that the purchasers with the concurrence of the mortgagee had taken over definite shares of the liability under the original mortgage. It appears to me quite clear that S. 21 (2), Lim. Act, applies to this case and therefore the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge is wrong. I set aside the decree passed in appeal and restore the decree of the learned District Munsif, holding that the suit as against defendant 12 was barred by limitation. The appellants will recover their costs from the respondent in this Court and in the lower Appellate Court.

Criminal Revn. Case No. 377 and Petn. No. 346 of 1937, Decided on 23rd September 1937, from order of Dist. Magistrate, Guntur, in C. R. P. No. 4 of 1937.

Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 203, 436—Complaint dismissed under S. 203—District Magistrate cannot order complaint to be restored to file.

Where a Magistrate dismisses a complaint under S. 203, the District Magistrate cannot under S. 436 order that the complaint should be restored to file. The proper order is to direct further inquiry and the Magistrate has unfettered discretion to dismiss the complaint once more if he thinks it proper to do so. [P 112 C 2]

Order. — The order of the District Magistrate under S. 436, Criminal P. C., is not correct in form or in substance. He cannot compel a Magistrate to take cognizance of a complaint. He has said that the complaint "should be restored to file", but as it was dismissed under S. 203 it never was on the file. The proper order to have made was to direct further inquiry into the case, which does not necessarily imply that process should be issued to the person against whom the complaint was directed. All that it is necessary to say is that the Magistrate before whom the case now is should hold an inquiry under S. 202, Criminal P. C., and proceed according to law, with unfettered discretion to dismiss the complaint once more if he thinks it proper to do so. The criminal revision petition is allowed.

Motilal Daga, trading under name and style of Sait Balakisandas Motilal and others — Respondents.

Appeal No. 325 of 1934, Decided on 6th August 1937, against order of Sub-Judge, Cocanada, D/- 5th July 1934.

(a) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 182, Expl. 2 —Decree transferred for execution—Application to Court which passed decree to transfer it to another Court is application to proper Court and is step-in-aid.

There is nothing in the Civil P. C. to prevent simultaneous execution of a decree in more than one Court, though it is a matter for the discretion of the Court to permit or refuse concurrent execution. The Court which passed the decree retains control of execution proceedings. Hence, even where a decree is transferred for execution to another Court, an application to the Court which passed the decree to transfer the decree to a third Court for execution is one made to the proper Court and amounts to a step-in-aid of execution within meaning of Art. 182, Limitation Act: A I R 1928 Mad 493; A I R 1935 Lah 465 and A I R 1937 Rang 258, Foll. [P 114 C 2; P 115 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 42 — Transferee Court—Powers of.

Section 42 does not empower the transferee Court to order simultaneous execution or send the decree to another Court for execution. [P 114 C 2]

(c) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 182, Cl. (5) —'Final order' — Meaning—Application for transfer of decree to another Court for execution— Application being defective, Court ordering further time for remedying defects —Such order is not final order.

What is material under Art. 182, Cl. 5 is the final order on the application and not the date of the application. The order need not be an order on the merits or a judicial determination of the matter involved in the application. But the words 'final order' imply that the proceeding has terminated so far as the Court passing it is concerned. It cannot mean the 'last order' in point of time, irrespective of whether it terminates the proceeding so far as the Court is concerned. Where therefore an application is made to a Court for transfer of a decree for execution to another Court and, the application being defective, the Court makes an order granting further time for remedying the defects such order does not terminate the proceeding and hence does not amount to final order within the meaning of Art. 182, Cl. 5: A I R 1937 Mad 885 (F B), Rel. on. [P 115 C 1]

K. Bhashyam Aiyangar for Advocate-General and A. Satyanarayana — for Appellant.

Lakshmana Rao J.—This appeal arises out of an application for transmission of the decree in O. S. No. 72 of 1922 on the file of the Subordinate Judge of Cocanada for execution to the District Court of South Arcot and the questions for determination are (1) whether the application is barred by limitation against the appellant (defendant 3) and (2) whether the decree is executable against him. Respondent 1 is the decree-holder and the suit was for recovery of Rs. 28,374.11.9 due under two promissory notes executed by the appellant and respondents 2 and 3. The appellant pleaded that he was a surety and the suit was decreed on 19th February 1923 as follows:

> It is ordered and decreed that the plaintiff (respondent 1) do proceed against defendants 1 and 2 (respondents 2 and 3) in the first instance and against defendant 3 (appellant) in case the amount cannot be realised from defendants 1 and 2 and do recover Rs. 25,777-4-9 with further interest and proportionate costs.

A sum of Rs. 3,652-4-1 was realised by 1926 by executing the decree against respondents 2 and 3, and two applications were filed by the decree holder on 18th January 1927 for transmission of the decree to the District Munsifs of Kovvur and Rajahmundry for simultaneous execution against respondents 2 and 3. The applications were ordered on 20th January 1927 and decree copies were transmitted to the District Munsifs of Kovvur and Rajahmundry. No steps were however taken at Kovvur or Rajahmundry and an application for transmission of the decree to the Sub-Court of Vizagapatam for execution against respondents 2 and 3 was filed in the Sub-Court of Cocanada on 20th January 1930 (18th and 19th January being holidays). It was alleged in the petition that the decree copies transmitted to the District Munsifs of Kovvur and Rajahmundry had been returned, though in fact only the decree copy sent to the District Munsif of Kovvur had been returned, and the application was defective in other respects as well. So it was returned on 23rd January 1930 for amendment, and the decree holder applied for and obtained time for that purpose on several occasions. The application was returned for the last time on 9th October 1930 and it was not represented thereafter. The application out of which this appeal arises was filed on 27th September 1932 for transmission of the decree to the District Court of South Arcot for execution against the appellant and respondents 2 and 3, and the latter did not appear. It was not alleged in the application that the decree amount cannot be realised from respondents 2 and 3 and the appellant pleaded that the decree cannot be executed against him until then. Even otherwise he contended that the application of 20th January 1930 was not made to the proper Court and cannot save limitation, but the Subordinate Judge overruled the plea of limitation on the ground that the present application was filed within three years of the prior application. The contention that the prior application was not made to the proper Court and cannot save limitation was not considered, and though evidence was not led, and there is nothing on record to show that the decree amount cannot be realised from respondents 2 and 3, the Subordinate Judge negatived the other plea on the ground that the decree does not say that the decree-holder should exhaust the properties of respondents 2 and 3 before proceeding against the appellant, and that the time for executing the decree against the appellant had arisen in 1932 when the decree-holder was obliged to take out the execution against him.

Hence this appeal and it was argued first, that assuming the decree to be executable against the appellant, the application of 20th January 1930 cannot prevent time from running and the present application was barred by limitation against him. Art. 182, Cl. 5, Limitation Act, which was relied upon by the decree-holder, allows three years from the date of the final order on an application made in accordance with law to the proper Court for execution or to take some step-in-aid of execution of the decree, and it was contended on behalf of the appellant that the application of 20th January 1930 was not even made to the proper Court within the meaning of that clause. 'Proper Court', according to Expln. 2 to Art. 182, means the Court whose duty it is to execute the decree, and it was urged that once the decree is transmitted to another Court for execution, that Court alone can execute it and the Court which passed the decree is not competent to entertain an application for transmission or execution, until the decree is returned to it with a certificate of non-satisfaction. This contention was not dealt with by the Subordinate Judge, though it was pressed before him and a finding had to be called for as to whether the decrees transmitted to the District Munsifs of Kovvur and Rajahmundry had been returned to the Subordinate Judge of Cocanada by 20th January 1930. It is now agreed that, as found by the Subordinate Judge, only the decree copy sent to the District Munsif of Kovvur had been returned, and the question is whether by reason of the non-return of the decree copy by the other Court, the Sub-Court of Cocanada was not competent to entertain an application for transmission of the decree to the District Court of South Arcot. This question was decided in A I R 1928 Mad 493,[1] in which all the previous decisions were considered and we see no reason for dissenting from the view taken therein that in such cases the Court which passed the decree is competent to transfer the decree to a third Court for execution. To the same effect are the decisions in 5 Rang 397[2] and A I R 1935 Lah 465,[3] and an examination of the relevant provisions of the Civil Procedure Code leads to the same result.

There is nothing in the Code to prevent simultaneous execution of a decree in more than one Court, though it is a matter for the discretion of the Court to permit or refuse concurrent execution, and it is clear from the provisions of O. 21, R. 26, which requires the transferee Court to stay execution to enable the judgment-debtor to apply to the Court which passed the decree for an order to stay execution or for any other order relating to the decree or execution which might have been made by such Court if execution had been issued thereby or if application for execution had been made thereto, that the Court which passed the decree retains control of the execution proceedings. S. 46, which relates to precepts, points to the same conclusion and the power to order simultaneous execution or send the decree to another Court for execution is vested in the Court which passed the decree. S. 42 does not empower the transferee Court to order simultaneous execution or send the decree to another Court for execution, and as pointed out in A I R 1928 Mad 493[1] and 63 M L J 788,[4] the decision of the Privy Council in 39 Mad 640[5] does not touch this question. question there was whether an application would lie to the District Court of Vizagapatam for sale of property attached by the District Munsif of Parvatipur, and as observed already, it is for the Court which passed the decree to decide whether in the circumstances of any case simultaneous execution against different properties in different Courts should be ordered or the proceedings should be withdrawn from one Court and transferred to another Court. An application for either relief would therefore lie only to the Court which passed the decree and it would be the proper Court within the meaning of Expl. 2 to Art. 182. The Sub-Court of Cocanada was thus the proper Court and the application of 20th January 1930 was an application to take some step-in-aid of execution. But what is material under the amended Art. 182, Cl. 5 is the date of the final order on the application and not the date of the application, and it remains to consider whether the order of 9th October 1930 granting further time for remedying the defects is such an order. The order need not in our opinion be an order on the merits or a judicial determination of the matter involved in the application, but as pointed out in (1937) 1 M L J 453[6] in which the previous decisions were considered, the words 'final order' imply that the proceeding has terminated so far as the Court passing it is concerned. It cannot mean the 'last order' in point of time, irrespective of whether it terminates the proceedings so far as the Court is concerned, and the order of 9th October 1930 merely granted further time for remedying the defects. It did not terminate the proceeding and the application was not represented. There was thus no final order within the meaning of Art. 182, Cl. 5 and it follows that the application is barred by limitation as against the appellant.

As regards the second question, the decree provides that the appellant should be proceeded against only in case the amount cannot be realised from respondents 2 and 3 and it was not alleged in the application for transmission that the amount cannot be realised from respondents 2 and 3. No evidence was led about it nor is there anything on record to show that the amount cannot be realised from respondents 2 and 3. The assumption of the Subordinate Judge that the decree-holder must have been obliged to apply for execution against the appellant in 1932 is unwarranted, and it follows that the appellant cannot be proceeded against. In the result the appeal is allowed and the application will stand dismissed against the appellant with costs throughout. The advocate's fee is in the circumstances of the case fixed at Rs. 250.

Order 22, Rr. 3 and 4 are applicable to proceedings under S. 115 and an order passed by the High Court on a petition under S. 115 in ignorance of the fact of death of the petitioner more than ninety days previously is one made without jurisdiction and is a nullity: Case law discussed.

Order.—This petition, C. R. P. No. 284, is by the minor sons of Pendyala Subba Rao and is a sequel to C. R. P. No. 1605 of 1932. In C. M. P. 4021 petitioners apply to be recognized as Subba Rao's legal representatives and this petition is granted. Subba Rao filed C. R. P. 1605 in this Court to vacate a decree which had been passed against him for Rs. 628. The decree had been passed on an award and no appeal lay against it. That is why Subba Rao had to come by way of a petition to the High Court under S. 115, Civil P. C. This Court set aside the decree and directed the trial Court to make a fresh decree after giving Subba Rao an opportunity to substantiate his objections to the award. That order was passed on 10th May 1934. But when the trial Court took up the suit for retrial, it discovered that Subba Rao had died on 7th January 1934, a fact which of course the High Court did not know when it passed orders in C. R. P. No. 1605.

The trial Court without bringing on the present petitioners as Subba Rao's representatives held that the High Court's order was not valid and declared that the decree already made in the suit must stand. C. R. P. No. 284 is to set aside this order and to affirm the order passed in C. R. P. No. 1605 and to direct the trial Court to proceed to determine the suit as directed by that order. In my opinion the order made by the trial Court is right and the decree already passed in the suit must stand. It seems to me that the matter is free from all doubt. Ninety days after Subba Rao's death, that is to say on 7th April 1934, Subba Rao's petition abated since his legal representatives did not apply to be brought on the record and to continue that petition. After 7th April there was no petition before the High Court and its order passed in ignorance of the fact of abatement was a nullity. O. 22, Rr. 3 and 4 govern the case. Where the sole plaintiff in a suit dies, the Court shall cause his legal representative to be made a party and shall proceed with the suit. But the Court cannot do this except upon an application made to it and if no application is made within the time allowed by law the suit shall abate. Article 176 of Sch. 1, Limitation Act, prescribes ninety days as the time in which an application of this kind must be made. The C. R. P. No. 1605 therefore abated ninety days after 7th January. Elaborate and skilful arguments have been addressed to me by the learned counsel for these petitioners. He contends first that in the case of petitions under S. 115, Civil P. C., it does not matter whether the parties are dead or alive at the time the order is passed, since in such case the matter is entirely one between the High Court and the trial Court. To admit such a principle would be to deny the fundamental right of parties to a litigation to be heard. Learned counsel's second argument is that O. 22 does not apply to proceedings under S. 115, and therefore there can be no abatement in the case of a petition filed under that section. But if O. 22 does not apply, the natural consequence is that on the death of a party the petition abates at once. Moreover, in this Court, at any rate, and in the Calcutta High Court (see 18 C L J 141[1]), O. 22 has always been applied to petitions under S. 115. Still another argument is that there have been cases where decrees passed after the death of a party have not been treated as a nullity. And the cases have been cited to me. But in none of them had the suit or other proceedings abated at the time of the decree. In all of them there was at the time of the decree a case before the Court which it was necessary to determine and which could not be dismissed forthwith. If in these cases the Court had become aware of the death of the deceased party, it could not have proceeded forthwith to pass a decree. It would have had to adjourn the case till the expiration of the time allowed by law for an application to bring on the legal representative of the deceased. In the present case the order of the High Court is a nullity because at the time it was passed there was no case before the Court at all. For a similar case, see A I R 1925 Bom 290.[2]

39 Mad 386[3] and A I R 1930 Mad 719[4] are cases where an unsuccessful appellant attempted to have the appellate decree set aside on the ground that a respondent had died before decree. It was held that in the interests of justice it was not advisable to give an unsuccessful litigant a right to argue his case more than once merely on the ground that one of the parties to the proceeding was dead at the time of hearing. In 33 Mad 167[5], the plaintiff in the suit died on the morning of the day on which the suit was heard and decided. Sixteen years later, the plaintiff's successor in title brought a similar suit on the same cause of action on the footing that the decree in the former suit was a nullity. It was held that the second suit was barred. Benson and Sankaran Nair JJ apparently considered that in spite of the decree having been made, the deceased plaintiff's heir could at once have brought the fact of plaintiff's death to the notice of the Court which tried the suit and could have applied to have the abatement set aside. Those learned Judges applying O. 22, R. 9 held that this was his only remedy and since he had not taken it he was not entitled to bring a fresh suit on the same cause of action. Incidentally, they observed that a decree passed in favour of a deceased plaintiff is not void when the record does not show the fact and time of death. In A I R 1928 Lah 784,[6] one of the defendants had died before the decree. The learned Judges who decided the appeal of the defendants held that since the suit had not abated as against the deceased defendant at the time of the decree, the decree could be set aside and the suit ordered to be retried in the presence of his legal representative from the stage it had reached immediately before the date of his death. But they considered this course unnecessary as the legal representative had been brought on record in the appeal itself and his introduction at that stage was an introduction for all stages and moreover all the evidence touching the question in issue in the appeal had been produced before the defendant died. 49 C L J 482[7] was a case where the appellant died 29 days before the appellate decree. It was similar to the case now under consideration in this respect that the decree on appeal was in favour of the deceased; but dissimilar in what I consider to be the decisive point, namely that the appeal had not abated at the time of the appellate decree: 49 C L J 482[7]

This Court has not gone the length of A I R 1928 Lah 784[6] in holding that a decree made against a deceased defendant is valid provided that it appears that his legal representative is not prejudiced by the decree. On the contrary, in 52 Mad 933[8] this Court has held that such a decree has no validity in law. In that case, which was a civil revision petition, ninety days had not elapsed from the death of the respondent when the decretal order was passed. And this circumstance was regarded as in itself sufficient to invalidate the decretal order, it being held that during the time the legal representative may be brought on record, the action is in a state of suspense and that during that time no valid act which involves decision on the merits of any part of the action can be done by the Court: see also A I R 1931 Lah 73.[9] It is hardly necessary to cite authority for the proposition that a decree made after the action has abated as against a deceased defendant is a nullity as against that defendant: 15 Lah 879[10]. In the result I hold that the learned District Munsif was right in refusing to obey the order made in C. R. P. 1605 of 1932 when he became aware that that order was passed without jurisdiction and was a nullity being passed after the petition had abated and without the legal representatives of the petitioner being brought on the record. This C. R. P. is dismissed with costs. (His Lordship then dealt with C. M. Ps. 4022, 4023 and 4024 and dismissed them.)

Suit Nos. 96 and 445 of 1934, Decided on 19th April 1937.

 (a) Tort — Negligence — Public latrine erected by Corporation against compound wall of Railway Company — Knowledge to company that if wall not kept in proper repairs it would cause danger to those using latrine—Duty of company to repair wall—Wall falling and killing two persons using latrine—Latrine wall in reasonably good condition - Company and not Corporation held liable for damages.

Whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that every one of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognize that if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances, he would cause danger or injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger. [P 121 C 2]

A public latrine was erected by the Corporation against the compound wall of the Railway Company. The Company were aware that the members of the public were in the habit of using the latrine and they were also aware that if their compound wall were allowed to get into a state in which it was likely to fall, danger to the members of the public using the latrine would be occasioned.

It was one of the duties of the building inspector of the company to inspect the wall. The wall was not properly kept in repairs and it fell upon the latrine causing the collapse of the wall of the latrine thereby killing two persons using the latrine. The wall of the latrine was in a reasonably good condition. In a suit for damages against the Railway Company and the Corporation:

Held that the Railway Company owed a duty to the lawful users of the latrine, including the two deceased, to take reasonable care to prevent this wall falling. In failing to remedy the defects and to keep the wall in a safe condition, they were guilty of breach of duty which they owed and were therefore negligent and liable to pay damages. [P 122 C 2]

Held further that the Corporation was not liable to pay damages as it was only responsible for the latrine and it was in reasonably safe condition: (1883) 11 Q B D 503; (1932) A C 562 and (1934) 51 T L R 21, Ref. [P 122 C 2]

(b) Madras Municipal Act (4 of 1919), S. 258—S. 258 is not mandatory but permissive - Failure to give notice does not give any member of public right of complaint against Corporation.

In order to establish that a public body like a Corporation is liable to action for default in performing a duty imposed by statute, it must be shown that the Legislature has used language indicating an intention that this liability shall be imposed, and unless such intention on the part of the Legislature is clearly disclosed, no action will lie. [P 123 C 1]

The wording of S. 258 is not in its terms mandatory but permissive. The section merely empowers the Corporation, if they deem it right so to do, to notify the occupier of defective buildings. If they fail to exercise their power under the section, it does not give any member of the public a right of complaint against the Corporation. There is nothing in the Municipal Act which indicates a liability cast upon the Corporation at the suit of a member of the public for their failure to exercise their powers under S. 258: (1895) 1 Q B 64 and (1892) A C 345, Rel. on. [P 122 C 2; P 123 C 1]

 (c) Practice—Costs—In proper case, unsuccessful defendant can be ordered to pay successful defendant's costs directly.

In an action claiming relief against more than one defendant who are reasonably joined, the Court has jurisdiction in a proper case to order the unsuccessful defendant to pay the costs of the successful defendant directly: (1914) 3 K B 181; (1903) 2 K B 533 and (1881) 17 Ch D 600, Foll. [P 124 C 1]

Judgment.—These are two suits brought under the provisions of the Fatal Accidents Act 1855, and by consent of all parties have been tried together as the facts in regard to both claims are identical save in respect of the damages which are claimed. In C. S. No. 96 of 1934 the plaintiff is the widow of one Venkataswami Naidu. In C. S. No. 445 of 1934 plaintiff 1 is the widow and plaintiffs 2 and 3 are the minor children of one Saman. The claims in both suits are for damages representing the loss of maintenance which the respective plaintiffs allege that they have sustained on account of the death of the two deceased who were the wage-earners of their respective families. There has been a considerable body of evidence given in these suits, none of which is very reliable and all the witnesses exaggerated in their evidence, what, I have come to the conclusion, were the real facts. 1st defendants own land in Walltax Road upon which is erected a railway station and permanent way. This is bordered on Walltax road by a wall of the total length of about 3,000 feet running approximately north and south. So far as this case is concerned, a small portion only of that wall is affected, some 300 or 400 yards north of the railway station. At this point there was erected a public latrine. The latrine was 58 feet 6 inches in length and having an over-all width of 16 feet. The railway wall, which I will hereafter refer to as the compound wall, formed the western boundary of the latrine. There were two walls, being the north and south boundaries running at right angles to the compound wall and joining to it. These two walls were about 16 feet in length. The eastern boundary of the latrine was formed by a wall joining the outer ends of the north and south walls. The latrine was divided into two parts by a central wall running parallel to the compound wall and to the eastern wall of the latrine. This wall was about 58 feet 6 inches in length. The compound wall was about 10 or 11 feet high and the other walls I have mentioned were about 6 feet 6 inches in height. The entrance to the latrine was gained by two openings made in the north wall. The access to the latrine from Walltax road was gained by means of a passage from that road leading to the latrine, the distance from the road to the latrine being about 53 feet and around the north, east and south boundaries of the latrine, there was an open space leading from the passage I have mentioned. This latrine was erected by 2nd defendants. Under S. 184, Madras City Municipal Act 1919, it is provided as follows:

The Corporation shall provide and maintain in proper and convenient places a sufficient number of public latrines and shall cause the same to be kept clean and in proper order.

It is admitted by all parties that this latrine is one coming within the provisions of the above section and therefore it was a latrine belonging to the 2nd defendants, the Corporation, for which they were responsible as set out in the above section. At about 8 a. m. on 16th December 1933, the two deceased men I have mentioned were using the latrine and for that purpose were in the eastern or outer portion. The 1st defendants' compound wall fell and in falling knocked over the central wall of the latrine. These two men were killed by the falling of these two walls. The part of the compound wall which fell included not only the 58 feet 6 inches bordering the latrine but also about 10 feet on the north and south sides, in all about 80 feet of the compound wall fell. The claims against the two defendants are based upon negligence and nuisance. So far as the 1st defendants are concerned, in C. S. No. 96 of 1934 it is alleged that they left the relevant portion of the compound wall in a state of disrepair and were therefore negligent. After the close of all the evidence and indeed after the counsel on behalf of the two defendants had addressed me, an application was made by counsel on behalf of the plaintiff in that suit to add a claim against 1st defendants in nuisance. It was made at a very late stage of the proceedings and I granted this application upon the terms that in the event of succeeding upon that cause of action, the plaintiff should pay the costs of the defendants up to the date when the application was made, namely 5th April 1937. In C. S. No. 445 of 1934 the plaintiff alleges in the plaint that the claims of the plaintiffs in that suit are based on nuisance as well as negligence.

As regards the 2nd defendants, the claim against them is on the ground of negligence, the negligence being that they failed to keep the western wall of the latrine, being the 1st defendants' compound wall, in a proper state of repair and also they failed to inform the 1st defendants of the dangerous state in which this wall was previous to this fall. The basis of the latter allegations arises from the provisions of S. 258, Madras City Municipal Act, which provides that if any building be deemed by the Commissioner to be in a ruinous state or dangerous to passers-by or to the occupiers of neighbouring structures, the Commissioner may, by notice, require the owner or occupier to fence off, take down, secure or repair such building so as to prevent any danger therefrom. It is contended that the provisions of this section provide a cause of complaint by a member of the public if the Commissioner, that is to say the 2nd defendants do not warn the occupier of the dangerous condition of buildings or take the necessary steps to see that dangerous buildings are prevented from causing danger to the public.

The defences to the claims as pleaded in the written statements in addition to the denials of negligence and nuisances are that the compound wall and central wall fell owing to violent storms of rain and wind amounting to vis major. This would mean that the storms were such as to be beyond the ordinary contemplation of man. During the course of the evidence with which I shall deal more fully later, it appears that rain had fallen, but the above contention finds no support from the evidence called either on behalf of the plaintiffs or on behalf of the two defendants and indeed neither of the learned counsel for the defendants really relied upon this in their addresses to me at the close of the evidence. Whilst the erection of a wall upon land is an ordinary user of the land, nevertheless it is an uncommon occurrence for a wall to fall and when a wall does fall, in my view an explanation should be forthcoming from those who are responsible for its repair; (1880) 5 Q B D 411[1] was a case in which a brick in a bridge over a highway used by locomotives fell upon a foot passenger and it was held this was an unusual occurrence and the falling of the brick itself was prima facie evidence of negligence. In the absence of a satisfactory explanation from those responsible for the upkeep of the bridge, it was held, in that case, that the fall of the brick itself was sufficient evidence of negligence to justify the plaintiff succeeding in an action against the Railway Company.

The only explanation for the fall of the compound wall which has been given to me in the present case was that supplied by the building inspector employed by the 1st defendants, P. N. Swami Naidu, D. W. 1. It was this: He said that the flooring of the latrine was made of concrete but was not in satisfactory repair inasmuch as there were holes, which he called pits, in the floor. There had been rain in Madras on 14th and 15th December, that is to say two days previous to the fall of the wall. On account of the defects in the flooring, the rain had not flowed away but had stagnated in these pits against the wall during those two days and in stagnating it had percolated into the compound wall undermining its strength and caused its fall. I cannot accept such an explanation. A copy of the Fort St. George Gazette was produced with the concurrence of all parties. It is recorded that on 14th December there was 2.1 inches of rain, on the 15th December, 2.05 inches, on the 16th December, that is to say the day of the fall of the wall, the rainfall was 6.42 inches. The evidence of the conditions existing at the time of the fall, which I accept, was that it was drizzling. The accident occurred at 8 o'clock in the morning and there was no evidence before me that between midnight and 8 o'clock in the morning there had been any unusually heavy amount of rain; and although on the day of the accident there was the quantity I mentioned, I am satisfied that there had been very little of rainfall by the time the compound wall fell at 8 A. M. All the witnesses called for the plaintiff who were asked in cross-examination regarding wind denied that there was any violent wind at the time when the compound wall fell and no evidence was called on behalf of the defendants to suggest that that part of the plaintiffs' witnesses' evidence was inaccurate. With the comparatively small amount of rain, which I have mentioned, falling prior to this accident, and the unacceptable suggestion that pools of water collecting for the short period of 2 days at the base of a substantial wall would destroy its strength, the explanation which has been given to me as regards this unfortunate accident cannot be accurate and I reject it. The one or two witnesses who arrived after the wall had fallen and helped to extricate the two unfortunate deceased men did not speak to any collection of water in the latrine.

It therefore follows that so far as the fall of the compound wall is concerned, no explanation is forthcoming from either of the defendants. I have mentioned already that the witnesses called before me exaggerated matters in their testimony. This also applies to the several witnesses who were called on behalf of the plaintiffs. I accept however from these witnesses that prior to this fall the compound wall showed signs of wear inasmuch as there were many cracks showing in the wall. During the course of the hearing, in the presence of the advocates on behalf of all the parties, I inspected this wall. The part which is now in the position occupied by the fallen portion is of course in excellent condition. Immediately to the south of the new wall there is a length of wall which clearly is not very old and one of the witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiffs told me that some five or six years ago this portion of wall to the south of the latrine had been rebuilt and the appearance I saw bears out the evidence of that witness. Further south of this portion, to which I have just referred, part of the old wall exists, which part is doubtless similar in age and construction to the fallen part by the latrine. The condition of this I can describe only as deplorable. Large pieces of mortar between the bricks with which this wall was built are missing, in some places to a depth of nearly half an inch; and generally it shows signs of decay and wear. I also saw cracks and loose bricks in this part of the wall. This condition is compatible with the fallen wall as described by some of the witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiffs, the defective condition being clearly visible to any one including persons with no knowledge of buildings.

I accept the evidence of the witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiffs who described the fallen wall as defective, not to the extent to which some of these witnesses mentioned. One of them said that there was a hole in the wall through which a man was able easily to pass. I do not believe that part. I do accept their evidence that many other defects were apparent in the compound wall, bordering on the latrine, which defects at the time of the accident required urgent repair. In regard to this wall, D. W. 1, 1st defendants' building inspector, told me that it was part of his duty every two months to inspect the compound wall in order to see whether any parts were defective and whether any work was required to repair the wall in order to keep it in proper order, and that his last inspection was carried out within two months prior to the accident. He told me that at that inspection he found no cracks, that if there had been cracks he would have discovered them, that if there had been defects in the wall which would cause it to fall within two months after his inspection he would have been able to discover those defects and that in his experience he had never known a wall to be caused to fall by the stagnation of water near its base for two days. He also told me that it was his responsibility to his employers, 1st defendants, to inform them of the condition of this wall so that they could carry out the necessary repairs. In the light of the evidence which I have accepted, I am quite satisfied that either he made no inspection which it was his duty to make or, if he made it, it was of such a cursory nature that he failed to notice the defects which existed or, if he did notice them, he failed to report them. The 1st defendants, if they were not aware of the defective condition of this wall, certainly should have known of it as every opportunity was available for them to do so through their building inspector P. W. 1 whose duty it was to inform them.

I am satisfied that the fall of the compound wall was caused solely on account of its serious defective condition and by the failure of 1st defendants to carry out the necessary repairs which were required. By allowing this wall to get into this condition and in failing to remedy the existing defects, 1st defendants did not use ordinary care and skill which they should have used in order to maintain the compound wall in a safe condition. Had they used ordinary care and skill, they would have prevented this wall from falling. It was not suggested that 1st defendants were unaware that the latrine had been erected against their compound wall and that they did not know that members of the public had a right to use and were in the habit of using this latrine. Both these matters were within their knowledge. So far as the latrine itself is concerned, whilst it may not have been in a perfect condition, I am satisfied on the evidence I have heard that it was in a reasonably good state of repair and I accept the evidence of the two witnesses called on behalf of the Corporation when they say that a short time before the fall of the compound wall the latrine was whitewashed and that the condition of the walls and the floor was reasonably good. It is perfectly clear to me that the fall of the central wall was caused by the compound wall falling on to it and the weight breaking it down and not because of any defect in that wall itself. I come to the question whether 1st defendants are responsible to the plaintiffs in these suits. In (1883) 11 Q B D 503,[2] Brett, M. R., as he then was, at p. 509 in the course of his judgment says:

> Whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that every one of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognise that if he did not use ordinary care and the skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances, he would cause danger or injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger.

In the circumstances which existed here, the Railway Company were aware that members of the public, as I pointed out above, were in the habit of using a latrine erected against their compound wall. They would be aware that, if their compound wall were allowed to get into a state in which it would be likely to fall, danger to the members of the public using the latrine would be occasioned; they appreciated this inasmuch as they appointed D. W. 1 to inspect this compound wall, including the part adjoining the latrine, to see if any defects required attention. By doing this one can assume they appreciated this wall required repeated inspection in order that defects could be remedied and unless they were remedied the wall was likely to fall. The above statement of Brett, M. R. was referred to in (1932) A C 562[3] at p. 580. Lord Atkin in the course of his speech somewhat criticised the statement of the Master of the Rolls but added that if properly limited, that statement appeared capable of forming a valuable practical guide. Later at p. 580 Lord Atkin says:

> You must take reasonable care to avoid acts or omissions which you can reasonably foresee would be likely to injure your neighbour. Who then is in law your neighbour? The answer seems to be persons who are so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reasonably to have them in contemplation as being so affected when I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question.

At page 614, Lord Macmillan, having quoted the above passage and another passage of Brett, M. R., says:

> The passages I have quoted, like all attempts to formulate principles of law compendiously and exhaustively, may be open to some criticism and their universality may require some qualification, but as enunciations of general legal doctrine, I am prepared like Lord Hunter to accept them as sound guides.

It appears that the learned Law Lords, whilst to some extent they consider the passage of Brett, M. R., I have quoted above, may be somewhat widely worded, think it is a very sound guide regarding the duties which are owed by one member of the public to another. In (1934) 51 T L R 21,[4] the plaintiff was lawfully in a churchyard and whilst there, was injured by the fall of a tombstone which had been erected by the defendants. It was found that the defendants had been negligent in the erection of the tombstone. Lawrence J. in his judgment referred to and quoted from (1932) A C 562[3] at p. 580, cited above, and also referred to the question of proximity and the duty owed by one person to another mentioned by Lord Atkin and Lord Macmillan and later he says:

> The proximity referred to by Lord Atkin is in my view involved in the fundamental principle of the law of negligence that every one is bound to take the care which an ordinary prudent man would take in the circumstances.

He held that in that case the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages from the defendants who had been negligent in erecting the tombstone, that there was a duty cast upon them to every member of the public who might lawfully enter the churchyard, to use reasonable care in its erection and a responsibility to any who might be injured by the fall of the tombstone unless it were properly erected. In the present case, 1st defendants were aware that members of the public used this latrine, that unless the compound wall was in a satisfactory condition it might or would fall and endanger such persons, it was therefore their duty with this knowledge to take reasonable care. Allowing the compound wall to get into the dangerous condition in which it was, and in failing to repair the obvious existing defects or otherwise preventing it falling, were omissions by the 1st defendants which they could reasonably foresee might cause injury to the persons using the latrine. These persons were closely and directly affected by these acts which the 1st defendants should have had in contemplation. In the respects I have mentioned, they failed to take the care which ordinary prudent men would take in the circumstances which existed and were known. I see no difference in principle between the facts in this case and those in (1934) 51 T L R 21[4] in which it was held there was a duty cast upon tombstone erecters to every member of the public lawfully entering the churchyard in which it was erected to use reasonable care to prevent injury to such persons. The 1st defendants owed a duty to the lawful users of the latrine, including the two deceased, to take reasonable care to prevent this wall falling. In failing to remedy the defects and to keep the wall in a safe condition, they have been guilty of a breach of duty which they owed and were therefore negligent. In my view the plaintiffs in these two suits are entitled to succeed against the 1st defendants.

In regard to the 2nd defendants, they were not the owners, nor in control of the compound wall. The premises for which they were responsible was the latrine, which, I have already said, was in a reasonably safe condition. The failure by the Corporation to notify the Railway Company of the unsafe condition of the compound wall, as required by S. 258 is not in my view a matter which gives to any member of the public a right to recover from the 2nd defendants on the ground that they did not carry out their duty under this section. The wording of the section is not in its terms mandatory but permissive inasmuch as it provides that the Commissioner, that is the 2nd defendants, may by notice require the owner or occupier to repair. Apart from the provisions of that section, it cannot be and has not been contended before me that the Corporation are responsible to the plaintiffs inasmuch as they failed to notify the 1st defendants of the defective condition of the wall. This section in my view merely empowers the Corporation if they deem it right so to do to notify the occupier of defective buildings. It does not, if they fail to exercise their power under that section, give any member of the public a right of complaint against the Corporation. In (1895) 1 Q B 64,[5] the defendants were empowered under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, to remove street refuse from streets. Having failed to remove refuse, the plaintiff was caused to fall on account of such failure and he claimed damages from the defendant on account of their negligence in failing to remove the refuse. Mathew J. at p. 68 says in the course of his judgment:

> It is that, in order to establish that a public body of this description is liable to action for default in performing a duty imposed by statute, it must be shown that the Legislature has used language indicating an intention that this liability shall be imposed and unless such intention on the part of the Legislature is clearly disclosed, no action will lie.

Later he says:

> Before the Act the public had no right of action in such a case; why should it be supposed that the statute creates any such obligation? In my opinion the meaning of the section must be confined to the plain meaning of the words employed.

In (1893) A C 524,[6] Lord Hobhouse at page 527 says:

> The latest English case is that in (1892) A C 345.[7] It must be now taken as settled law that transfer to a public corporation of the obligation to repair does not by itself render such corporation liable to an action in respect of mere non-feasance. In order to establish such liability it must be shown that the Legislature has used language indicating an intention that this liability shall be imposed.

I cannot find and have not been referred to any part of the City Municipal Act which indicates a liability cast upon the 2nd defendants at the suit of a member of the public for their failure to exercise their powers under S. 258, and in this respect the plaintiffs' contention fails. So far as their personal neligence is concerned, whether the two deceased were invitees or licensees, in my view it is not necessary for me to decide. The premises of the 2nd defendants were in a reasonably good condition; and neither of the deceased was injured by reason of any defect in the structure of the 2nd defendants' latrine. The 2nd defendants were not the occupiers of the compound wall. This was in the occupation of 1st defendants. No authority has been quoted to me which lays down the principle that when a man is upon the premises of one person and is injured on account of the defective condition of another person's property, the person upon whose premises he is at the time of the injury is liable to compensate him for the damages sustained. In my view 2nd defendants are not liable to the plaintiffs in either of these suits in respect of the fall of the compound wall.

The next question is one of damages. In C. S. No. 96 of 1934, the evidence of Kuppammal, the plaintiff, was that her husband gave her one rupee every day out of which she paid the rent of the house in which she lived with her deceased husband. The food for both of them cost about 12 annas a day. Judging as best as one can, I have come to the conclusion, the maintenance which she was receiving from her husband amounted to a sum of about 6 to 8 annas a day. She is about 37 years of age and her husband, the deceased, was about 40. The sum she is entitled to is an amount by which she is a loser in respect of her future maintenance. Many factors have to be considered and borne in mind when endeavour is made to arrive at this sum. The possibility of her own early death, again the possibility that her deceased husband might have died from other causes had he not been killed by this accident. He might have also lost the employment upon which he was engaged at the time of his death and have been unemployed. She is not entitled, as it was contended before me, to a sum calculated upon a stated number of years from the moment of her loss. Allowance must be made because she is now receiving a lump sum. Bearing all these factors in mind I have come to the conclusion that the amount of damages which I should award to her is a sum of Rs. 1,200. In C. S. No. 445 of 1934 the dependants of the deceased Saman are his widow, plaintiff 1, who is about 35 years of age, plaintiff 2, the son of the deceased, a boy aged 10, and plaintiff 3, a girl aged 5. The deceased was 45 years of age. Plaintiff 1 informed me that her husband gave her one rupee a day out of which she paid the rent of the house and bought some of the clothes and spent 10 to 12 annas a day on food. Part of it of course would be consumed by the deceased. The deceased no doubt had eaten more food than the other members of the family. The loss of maintenance which these three have suffered appears to be about 8 or 10 annas a day, being a larger amount per day than in the other suit, because there were more members of the family to feed; consequently the deceased would not be able to avail himself of as much of the family contribution. The amount which I have to award must be allocated. Because there are three dependants, it does not mean that treble the amount given in the other case must be awarded. It is a sum based upon the actual loss, as far as one can estimate it, of the three plaintiffs concerned. The same factors must be borne in mind which I have mentioned. I have come to the conclusion that in this case a total sum of Rs. 1,750 is the amount which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in respect of the damages they have sustained by being deprived of their maintenance. This amount I allocate as to Rs. 1,000 to plaintiff 1, Rs 250 to plaintiff 2 and Rs. 500 to plaintiff 3. The amounts in respect of the minors, namely plaintiffs 2 and 3, will be paid in Court. There will be decrees in favour of the plaintiffs in both these suits against 1st defendants with costs.

As I have found in C. S. No. 96 of 1934 the plaintiff is entitled to succeed upon the plea of negligence, the question of the plaintiff paying 1st defendants' costs does not arise. There will be a decree in favour of 2nd defendants with costs. In regard to this order for costs, I intend to follow the English practice. The plaintiff acted reasonably in suing both defendants and it is therefore proper that the plaintiffs' liability to bear 2nd defendants' costs should be borne by 1st defendants : see (1914) 3 K B 181.[8] I make an order in favour of 2nd defendants direct against 1st defendants for costs according to the rule in (1903) 2 K B 533[9] and (1881) 17 Ch D 600.[10] These being pauper suits, it is necessary for me to order further that the fees to Government shall be a first charge on the amounts received.

C. P. Connell and another (Joint Official Liquidators)—Respondents.

Appeals Nos. 26, 27 and 28 of 1937, Decided on 12th August 1937, against order of Gentle J., D/- 5th February 1937.

(a) Company—Directors—Wilful negligence—Essentials to be proved stated.

Where an Article of Association comprises the indemnity to directors for anything done by them, except where loss has been incurred as the result of wilful neglect or wilful default on their part, in order to be guilty of wilful negligence the director must not only be guilty of negligence, but he must know that he is committing a breach of duty or is recklessly careless in the matter. A director is justified in trusting the integrity, skill and competence of the officials unless he has ground for suspicion. Where, apart from the insolvency of an official, there is no reason to suspect his integrity, the director is justified in trusting such official, as insolvency does not necessarily mean that a man is dishonest: (1925) 1 Ch 427; (1899) 2 Ch 629 and (1901) A C 477, Rel. on.

(b) Companies Act (1913), Ss. 103 and 235—Directors allowing company to start business in spite of their knowledge that permission to start business had been obtained owing to false declaration—Company suffering loss—Directors held guilty of wilful negligence and liable to make repayment.

The directors of a company must be deemed to know the law: (1908) 2 Ch 240, Rel. on.

Where the directors permitted the company to commence business in spite of their knowledge that permission to do so had been obtained owing to false declaration and that the directors had not paid what was due in respect of their respective shares and consequently the company suffered loss:

Held that the directors were guilty of wilful neglect and hence were liable to make repayment under S. 235. [P 128 C 2]

Leach C. J.—This appeal and Appeals Nos. 27 of 1937 and 28 of 1937 arise out of a misfeasance summons taken out by the Official Liquidators of the General Banking Corporation Limited against the directors of that Company. The appeals have been heard together and it will be convenient to deal with them in one judgment. The Company was registered on 11th May 1933, for the purpose inter alia of doing all kinds of banking business. The promoter was one P. K. Nair, a barrister-at-law, who was at the time and has since remained an undischarged insolvent. Nair, who was respondent 9 in the proceedings before the learned trial Judge, arranged that he should be appointed legal adviser to the Company and the "advisory director". A prospectus was prepared, but fortunately there was no general application made to the public to subscribe shares. There were eight other directors, who were respondents 1 to 8. Two of them, respondents 3 and 5 (B. Gulabchand Sowcar and M. L. Ranganayakulu), were not served and they took no part in the proceedings. Respondent 4, A. Madhava Rao, who was the chairman of the Company, and Nair absconded before the proceedings commenced. The Official Liquidators sought to make all the respondents, except respondents 3 and 5, liable under S. 235, Companies Act, 1913, for (1) a sum of Rs. 4,988-7-2, which has been misappropriated by Nair, and (2) a sum of Rupees 6,331-9-3, representing liabilities incurred by the Company from the date it started business until the date it closed its doors. The certificate permitting business to be started was issued on 4th September 1933, and business was actually commenced on the 7th of that month. The bank's doors were closed on 16th February 1934; a petition for winding up was presented on 5th March of that year and on 6th April 1934 a compulsory winding up order was passed.

Gentle J. before whom the case came held that respondents 1, 2 and 4 (Rao Bahadur M. C. Rajah, V. Venkateswara Sastrulu and A. Madhawa Rao) were each liable to pay the sum of Rs. 4,988-7-2 claimed as the first item and respondents 2, 4 and 6 (respondent 6 being D. Doss) were each responsible for the payment of the sum of Rs. 6,331-9-3 the second item claimed. He also held that in respect of the sum of Rs. 6,331-9-3 respondent 1 was liable to pay Rs. 2,833-9-9, and respondent 7, Rs. 5,408, these sums being calculated in accordance with the dates on which they resigned from the Board of Directors. Appeal No. 26 is the appeal of respondent 6 in respect of the sum of Rs. 6,331-9-3. Appeal No. 27 is by respondent 7 in respect of the sum of Rs. 5,408; and Appeal No. 28 embraces the appeals of respondents 1 and 2 in respect of the sum of Rs. 4,988-7-2, that of respondent 1 in respect of the sum of Rs. 2,833-9-9 and that of respondent 2 in respect of the sum of Rs. 6,331-9-3. Respondent 4 has not appealed and the order of the learned Judge has become final as against him.

The nominal capital of the Company was Rs. 1,00,000 divided into 2,000 shares of Rs. 50 each. Of the Rs. 50 payable on each share, Rs. 10 was payable on application, Rs. 15 on allotment and the balance in five equal instalments. The Articles of Association provided that the business of the Company might be commenced as soon as 50 shares, that is Rs. 2,500 had been subscribed. Before the Company was incorporated, a draft agreement had been prepared under which the Company was to advance to Nair a sum of Rs. 10,000 on the security of his interest in the assets of the Indian Law Times Ltd., and a life policy of Rs. 10,000. The Indian Law Times Ltd. had been acquired by Nair and his insolvency arose in connexion with this business. The arrangement was that of the loan of Rs 10,000, Rs. 5,000 should be paid to Nair for the purpose of enabling him to redeem the assets of the Indian Law Times Ltd. from the hands of the Official Assignee. After the incorporation of the Company, the agreement was executed and in due course Nair executed the requisite mortgage deed. Although business was not started until 7th September 1933, advertisements were inserted by Nair in the local press on 21st June and 15th July 1933, calling for applications for posts on the staff of the Company. It was intimated that the successful candidates would be required to deposit security for the proper performance of their duties. Applications were received in the course of July and August and a number of appointments were made, the persons appointed furnishing security in the aggregate sum of Rupees 10,720. I should mention that Art. 63 of the Articles of Association provided that the chairman should have the power of appointing, promoting, reducing, suspending and removing all officers of the bank, subject to the approval of the Board of Directors, and should have the power to fix all remunerations, salaries, and wages to be paid by the Company. Subscriptions were received for only sixtyfive shares. The subscriptions by the respondents were as follows :

Respondent No.		Number of Shares
2	...	5
3	...	20
4	...	10
5	...	5
6	...	5
7	...	5
8	...	5

paid Rs. 250 on account of the Rs. 1,000 owed by him in respect of his 20 shares, and respondent 7 paid Rs. 30 on account of the Rs. 250 owed by him in respect of his five shares. Respondents 5 and 8 appear to have paid for their shares in full. The actual capital which the Company had when it started business was Rs. 780. Item 1 of the claim, viz. the sum of Rupees 4,988.7.2, represents security deposits provided by the employees which Nair put into his own pocket. The Company had no right to utilise these moneys for its own purposes and the fact that Nair misappropriated them is common ground. The learned Judge held that respondents 1, 2 and 4 were responsible for this sum, because they had not used reasonable care in carrying out their duties. He considered that it was incumbent on them to see that the Company's moneys were in a proper state of investment and that Nair being an undischarged insolvent should not have been allowed to take charge of the security deposits of the employees. The learned Judge held as a fact that respondents 2 and 4 had knowledge of Nair's insolvency, but he was not satisfied that respondent 1 had such knowledge. He however held that they were all liable as they took no steps to see that a responsible person was attending to the Company's finances. They had all failed to carry out their duties and were guilty of the grossest negligence. The position with regard to this sum of Rs. 4,988.7.2 is altogether different from the position with regard to the sum of Rs. 6,331.9.3, which I will deal with separately.

With regard to the first sum, the learned advocate for respondents 1 and 2 (appellants here) contends that the learned trial Judge has misconceived the law with regard to the duties of directors. He says that on the authorities it must be shown that the directors had knowledge of the facts and that they acted wilfully despite their knowledge. Before passing to the authorities, I should refer to Art. 95 of the Articles of Association. This article had been very badly drafted, but it is intended to comprise the usual indemnity to directors for anything done by them, except where loss has been incurred as the result of wilful neglect or wilful default on their part, and it is accepted by both sides that it has this effect. The duties of directors and what is meant by wilful negligence were dealt with at length by Romer J. in (1925) 1 Ch 407[1] at p. 427. The learned Judge who discussed the authorities there pointed out that in order to ascertain the duties that a person appointed to the Board of an established Company undertakes to perform, it is necessary to consider not only the nature of the Company's business but also the manner in which the work of the Company is in fact distributed between the directors and the other officials of the Company, provided always that this distribution is a reasonable one in the circumstances, and is not inconsistent with any express provisions of the Articles of Association. In discharging the duties of his position thus ascertained, a director must, of course, act honestly; and he must also exercise some degree of both skill and diligence. The learned Judge however pointed out that (1) a director need not exhibit in the performance of his duties a greater degree of skill than may reasonably be expected from a person of his knowledge and experience; (2) he is not bound to give continuous attention to the affairs of the Company, his duties being of an intermittent nature to be performed at periodical meetings; and (3) in respect of all duties that having regard to the exigencies of business and the Articles of Association, may properly be left to some other official, a director is, in the absence of grounds for suspicion, justified in trusting that official to perform such duties honestly. Dealing with the question of wilful negligence, the learned Judge observed (page 434 of the report):

> An act, or an omission to do an act, is wilful where the person of whom we are speaking knows what he is doing and intends to do what he is doing. But if that act or omission amounts to a breach of his duty, and therefore to negligence, is the person guilty of wilful negligence? In my opinion that question must be answered in the negative unless he knows that he is committing, and intends to commit, a breach of his duty, or is recklessly careless in the sense of not caring whether his act or omission is or is not a breach of duty.

This view was affirmed by the Court of Appeal consisting of Pollock M. R., Warrington L. J. and Sargant L. J. With regard to the question whether a director is justified in trusting the officials of the Company, I would also refer to the observations of Lindley M. R. in (1899) 2 Ch 629[2] at p. 673 :

> Business cannot be carried on upon principles of distrust. Men in responsible positions must be trusted by those above them, as well as those below them, until there is reason to distrust them. We agree that care and prudence do not involve distrust ; but for a director acting honestly himself to be held legally liable for negligence, in trusting the officers under him not to conceal from him what they ought to report to him, appears to us to be laying too heavy a burden on honest business men.

This case was taken to the House of Lords : (1901) A C 477.[3] Lord Davey there said (page 492) :

> I think the respondent was bound to give his attention to and exercise his judgment as a man of business on the matters which were brought before the Board at the meetings which he attended, and it is not proved that he did not do so. But I think he was entitled to rely upon the judgment, information, and advice of the chairman and general manager, as to whose integrity, skill, and competence he had no reason for suspicion. I agree with what was said by Sir George Jessel, in In re Hallmark's case[4] and by Chitty J. in In re Denham & Co.,[5] that Directors are not bound to examine entries in the Company's books. It was the duty of the general manager and (possibly) of the chairman to go carefully through the returns from the branches, and to bring before the Board any matter requiring their consideration ; but the respondent was not, in my opinion, guilty of negligence in not examining them for himself, notwithstanding that they were laid on the table of the Board for reference.

Now what is the position here ? As I have pointed out, the matter of the appointment of the staff was in the hands of the chairman. It is not suggested that respondents 1 and 2 had any reason whatsoever to suspect the integrity of the chairman. It is also not suggested, apart from his insolvency, that they had any reason to suspect the integrity of Nair. It is true that Nair was an undischarged insolvent, but insolvency does not necessarily mean that a man is a dishonest man. There is here an entire absence of anything which would point the finger of suspicion to either the chairman or to Nair in the matter of these appointments. There was certainly no reason for any of the directors to suspect that Nair would utilise the security deposits for his own purposes, and there is no reason to suspect that the chairman knew that he was so doing. It is abundantly clear from the minutes that when it was discovered that Nair had utilised these security deposits for his own purposes, the matter was immediately taken up by the directors and he was called upon to repay. Nair appears to have utilised Rs. 4,500 of the deposits towards the Rs. 5,000 which was to be paid to him under the mortgage for the purposes of redeeming the assets of the Indian Law Times Limited, but instead of redeeming those assets he kept the money. But nobody knew about this until afterwards. The authorities show that where there is an indemnity clause of the kind we have here, not only must a director be guilty of negligence, but he must know that he is committing a breach of duty or is recklessly careless in the matter. Romer J. at p. 468 of the report in (1925) 1 Ch 427[1] emphasized this. It seems to us that respondents 1 and 2 were justified in trusting the chairman and Nair to deal properly with the employees and therefore it cannot be said that they were guilty of wilful negligence in so doing. In these circumstances we consider that the appeal so far as it relates to the sum of Rs. 4,988.7-2 must be allowed.

But entirely different considerations arise with regard to the sum of Rupees 6,331-9-3. In this connexion it is necessary to refer to S. 103, Companies Act. This section provides that a company shall not commence any business or exercise any borrowing powers unless (a) shares held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash have been allotted to an amount not less in the whole than the minumum subscription ; and (b) every director of the company has paid to the company on each of the shares taken or contracted to be taken by him and for which he is liable to pay in cash, a proportion equal to the proportion payable on application and allotment of the shares offered for public subscription or, in the case of a company which does not issue a prospectus inviting the public to subscribe for its shares, on the shares payable in cash ; and (c) there has been filed with the registrar a duly verified declaration by the Secretary or one of the Directors, in the prescribed form, that these conditions have been complied with. In this case the minimum subscription had been subscribed, but the amounts due on them by the directors had not all been paid and the certificate permitting the Company to commence business had been obtained as the result of a false declaration made by Nair. The learned Judge found that all the respondents knew of the obtaining of this certificate and that they were fully aware that the company had started business on 7th September 1933. They therefore all wilfully permitted the Company to carry on business on the strength of a certificate obtained by a false declaration. We have no doubt that respondents 2, 6 and 7 had knowledge of the obtaining of the certificate and of the fact that business commenced on 7th September 1933. With regard to respondent 1 it is said that he was actually in Madras only on 26th, 27th and 28th of July and between 13th and 18th of August. But it is clear on his own evidence that he returned to Madras on 28th September. We have no doubt that he was fully aware by that date, if not before, that the certificate had been obtained and that business was being carried on. We are also satisfied that these 4 respondents were fully aware that the directors had not paid what was due in respect of their respective shares and that they knew that the Company had no right to commence business. In any event they must be deemed to know the law. In (1908) 2 Ch 240,[6] which was also a case of misfeasance, Neville J. remarked :

> I think it is immaterial whether the Director had knowledge of the law or not I think he is bound to know what the law is, and the only question is, did he know the facts which made the act complained of a contravention of the statute ?

In the present case the learned trial Judge has held that they did know and we are in entire agreement with him. This means that the directors allowed this Company to open its doors and keep them open for months knowing full well that S 103 had not been complied with, that the Company had no capital with which to carry on business and that deposits made by customers in current and other accounts were being utilised by the management for the payment of wages and current expenses without any likelihood of the Company being able to pay back such moneys. In other words they knew that the bank was utilising its customer's moneys dishonestly. As the result of the Company having obtained by means of a false declaration a certificate allowing it to carry on business and as the result of the respondents having allowed the Company to keep open its doors, the Company has suffered loss to the extent of Rs. 6,331.9.3. We are of opinion that respondents 1, 2, 6 and 7 have been guilty of wilful negligence and that they are liable to make re-payment under S. 235, Companies Act. We therefore agree with the finding of the learned trial Judge on the second part of the case.

We have been asked to relieve these respondents from the consequences of their wilful negligence, under the provisions of S. 281, Companies Act. That section provides that if in a proceeding for negligence, default, breach of duty or breach of trust it appears to the Court hearing the case that the person may be liable but has acted honestly and reasonably and ought fairly to be excused, the Court may relieve him wholly or in part from his liability. This power to relieve is placed in the hands of the Court when it is convinced that a person has acted honestly and reasonably. In this case even if it be said that these respondents acted honestly, it cannot be said that they acted reasonably and we are unable to grant them any relief under this section. The order of the learned Judge against respondents 1, 2, 6 and 7 in respect of item 2 of the claim will therefore stand. As the appellants have succeeded in part and failed in part, we do not propose to make any order as to costs. The liquidators will have their costs out of the assets of the Company.

Motor Vehicles Act (1914), S. 16—Motorist from outside British India not evading licence fee but actually paying it on spot — Prosecution thereafter is illegal.

Order. — The conviction and sentence are clearly illegal and must be set aside. The motorist in this case coming from Bangalore made no attempt to evade payment of the British licence fee. He offered to pay the entire quarterly tax on the spot and he did pay it to the Magistrate. To prosecute him thereafter was illegal, for as a matter of fact by rules framed under S. 11, Motor Vehicles Tax Act, the proper procedure was to serve a notice on the motorist calling upon him to pay the tax within seven days. G. O. No. 2464 dated 28th September 1936 allows a period of seven days' grace for payment of the tax.

Ignorance of the law is no defence for persons accused of breaking the law, but such ignorance on the part of those who have to administer the law is quite inexcusable. The prosecution was unimaginative in any case. I accept this reference and set aside the conviction. The fine if paid will be refunded.

 (a) Criminal Trial—High Court—Inherent powers — Moral wrongs are not necessarily criminal offences—To attempt to create new offences in order to compel men to conform to high standard of morality, is abuse of process—High Court can in such cases interfere and set right abuse of process.

The High Court has inherent jurisdiction under S. 561-A, Criminal P C., to pass any order necessary to prevent abuse of the process of any Court. In the world of business, things are often done which are betrayals of confidence and deceptions which arouse moral indignation, but are nevertheless civil wrongs which can be righted by Civil Courts and are not crimes which can be punished by a Criminal Court. Not every immoral act is criminal and it is an abuse of the process of a Court to attempt to create a new crime in order to compel men to conform to a high standard of probity in business dealings or to force them to execute their promises. And therefore the High Court, to prevent specious and spiteful criminal prosecutions for actions which, though strictly dishonourable, yet do not amount to crimes, has jurisdiction to interfere. In the offence of cheating there are two elements —deception and dishonest inducement to do or omit to do something. Mere deception is not a criminal offence. Mere dishonesty is not a criminal offence To establish an offence of cheating, the complainant would have to show not only that he was induced to do or to omit to do a certain act but that this induced commission or omission on his part caused or was likely to cause him some harm or damage in body, mind, reputation or property, which are presumed to be the four cardinal assets of humanity. Order.—This is a petition by a person accused of cheating praying this Court to quash the proceedings against him on the ground that the complaint discloses no offence. The inherent jurisdiction of this Court to pass any orders necessary to prevent abuse of the process of any Court is not questioned and indeed has been clearly expressed in S. 561-A, Criminal P. C. Since prevention is always better than cure, the obligation to prevent specious and spiteful criminal prosecutions for actions which, though strictly dishonourable, yet do not amount to crimes, is one that must never be shirked. In the world of business things are often done which are betrayals of confidence and deceptions which arouse moral indignation but are nevertheless civil wrongs which can be righted by Civil Courts and are not crimes which can be punished by a Criminal Court. Not every immoral act is criminal and it is an abuse of the process of a Court to attempt to create new crimes in order to compel men to conform to a high standard of probity in business dealings or to force them to execute their promises.

The facts of this case are simple : The petitioner was an owner of motor buses plying for hire from Tanjore to other places. He used to take petrol and oil on credit from the firm of A. S. Manickam & Co. By the beginning of 1937 he owed this firm over Rs. 3,000. The firm refused him further credit and threatened to sue him. On 23rd March 1937 the petitioner gave the firm a post-dated cheque for Rs. 3,250 (dated 2nd April 1937). He was not however afterwards allowed any further credit, and had to pay cash for everything. On 5th April 1937 the firm presented the cheque at the Bank for encashment, but the cheque was dishonoured. Nothing further happened until more than three months later, viz. on 12th July 1937, when a clerk of the firm filed a criminal complaint of cheating against the petitioner, setting out the above facts. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Tanjore, took this complaint on file under Ss. 415 and 417, I. P. C., and sent it to the Stationary Sub-Magistrate, Tanjore, for disposal, who ordered process to issue to the petitioner. On 9th August 1937, A. S. Manickam & Co. filed a suit against petitioner for the sum owed by him and applied for attachment before judgment of his motor buses. The petitioner on 20th August 1937 filed an application asking the Stationary Sub-Magistrate, Tanjore, not to proceed further with the criminal complaint since no offence was disclosed and since the complaint was filed to coerce, harass and humiliate him. This petition having been dismissed, the High Court has now been moved.

In my judgment the complaint in question does not on its face show that any criminal offence has been committed. In the offence of cheating (S. 415, I. P. C.) there are two elements—deception and dishonest inducement to do or omit to do something. Let it be assumed that petitioner deceived and was dishonest. Mere deception is not a criminal offence. Mere dishonesty is not a criminal offence. The crux of the question in this case is whether A. S. Manickam & Co. were induced by petitioner's dishonest deception not to file a suit at once against him. On the facts stated it is clear that they were not. The post-dated cheque was given on 23rd March 1937 and dishonoured on 5th April 1937 (an interval of 13 days), but no suit was filed until 9th August 1937 (a further delay of four months). Moreover, to establish the offence of cheating, the complainant would have to show not only that he was induced not to file a suit for 13 days but that this induced omission on his part caused or was likely to cause him some harm or damage in body, mind, reputation or property—which are presumed to be the four cardinal assets of humanity. The complaint does not even assert that such harm or damage was caused or was likely to be caused, and it is obvious from the circumstances that no such harm or damage was or could have been caused. A post-dated cheque in payment of goods already received is a mere promise to pay on a future date: see A I R 1936 Cal 324,[1] and a broken promise is not a criminal offence, though it may amount in certain business relations discreditable behaviour. For these reasons, I allow this petition and quash the proceedings on the ground that no offence has been disclosed by the complaint as drafted but that it was filed in terrorem. The complaint in question is hereby dismissed under S. 203, Criminal P. C.

Section 120-B only applies where no offence has been actually committed and it is only in the latter rare cases where no crime has been committed in pursuance of a criminal conspiracy that sanction to initiate proceedings is necessary as some safeguard against frivolous prosecution. But where the matter has gone beyond the stage of mere conspiracy and offences are alleged to have been actually committed in pursuance thereof, Ss. 120-A and 120-B are wholly irrelevant. Conspiracy is one form of abetment and where an offence is alleged to have been committed by more than two persons, such of them as actually took part in the commission should be charged with the substantive offence, while those who are alleged to have abetted it by conspiracy should be charged with the offence of abetment under S. 109.

Public Prosecutor — for the Crown.

Order.—This is an application to quash the committal of six persons to stand their trial at the Court of Session, West Godavari. Four of them have been committed on a charge of extortion by putting a person in fear of death (S. 386, I. P. C.) and all six of them on a charge of criminal conspiracy (S. 120-B). The point taken before me is that under S. 196-A, Criminal P. C., no Court shall take cognizance of the offence of criminal conspiracy where the object of the conspiracy is to commit a non-cognizable offence, unless the previous sanction of the Local Government or of the District Magistrate has been obtained. The offence punishable by S. 386, I. P. C., is (rather strangely) non-cognizable. Admittedly, no sanction to prosecute or to initiate these proceedings was obtained. Admittedly also, this objection to the Court's jurisdiction was not taken in the lower Court, but has been made for the first time in this petition.

Now it has been held in 62 Cal 749[1] that failure to comply strictly with S. 196-A, Criminal P. C., is not a sufficient ground for quashing proceedings. If proceedings are initiated without formal sanction and end in the conviction of certain persons for criminal conspiracy, the conviction should, it was said, be upheld unless it can be shown that any one of the persons convicted was prejudiced by the formal defect complained of. If I may say so with respect, this is a sound doctrine. The offence of criminal conspiracy is sui generis. No overt act need be proved. S. 120-A is a comparatively new section in the Penal Code and may be thus analysed. A conspiracy to commit a criminal offence is always a criminal conspiracy punishable as such under S. 120-B even though nothing is done in pursuance thereof. Conspiracy to do an illegal act (which by the definition of 'illegal' in S. 43 includes a tort) or a lawful act by illegal means only amounts to criminal conspiracy and is only punishable under S. 120-B when some act (not an offence by itself) is done by one of the parties to the conspiracy in pursuance thereof. Now there is an obvious danger that charges of criminal conspiracy might be lightly made, savouring of persecution rather than of prosecution. And it was with a view to safeguarding citizens against such persecution on frivolous charges of criminal conspiracy that S. 196-A, Criminal P. C., was enacted at the same time as S. 120-B, I. P. C., insisting upon the previous approval of Government or of some senior and specially empowered Magistrate before such proceedings can be even initiated. If this safeguard is ignored by Magistrates, they should be suitably admonished. But when a case has been initiated and has ended in conviction, it is obvious that there never was any innocent person to be protected from persecution. In other words, S. 196-A was designed to safeguard persons from frivolous accusations of criminal conspiracy, not as a loophole of escape for persons committed after full magisterial inquiry on a charge of criminal conspiracy or convicted after full trial of criminal conspiracy.

But it has been held in 42 Mad 885[2] by a Bench of this Court that a sanction to prosecute for criminal conspiracy, given after the filing of the complaint, does not fulfil the requirements of S. 196. This decision follows 37 Cal 467,[3] and is an authority for the position that a conviction for criminal conspiracy should be set aside in the absence of proof that prior sanction to initiate the proceedings had been obtained. This decision is binding upon me. But the facts of the present case allow of its disposal on another ground. In my judgment Ss. 120-A and 120-B have been quite wrongly applied to this case and have no bearing at all.

1. Abdul Rahaman v. Emperor, (1935) 22 A I R Cal 316=1935 Cr C 467 = 156 I C 678 = 36 Cr L J 982=62 Cal 749.

2. Varadarajulu Naidu v. Emperor, (1920) 7 A I R Mad 928=51 I C 343=42 Mad 885=20 Cr L J 455=37 M L J 81 (S B).

3. Barindra Kumar Ghose v. Emperor, (1910) 37 Cal 467=7 I C 359=11 Cr L J 453=14 C W N 1114.

Where the matter has gone beyond the stage of mere conspiracy and offences are alleged to have been actually committed in pursuance thereof, these two sections are wholly irrelevant. Conspiracy, it should be borne in mind, is one form of abetment (see S. 107, I. P. C.) and where an offence is alleged to have been committed by more than two persons, such of them as actually took part in the commission should be charged with the substantive offence, while those who are alleged to have abetted it by conspiracy should be charged with the offence of abetment under S. 109, I. P. C. The Explanation to S. 109 makes this quite clear. An offence is said to be committed in consequence of abetment, when it is committed in pursuance of the conspiracy, and the abettor by conspiracy is made punishable (under S. 109) with the punishment provided for the actual offence.

The learned Magistrate has thus erred in applying S. 120-B to this case. He should properly have used S. 109, for, S. 120-B only applies where no offence has been actually committed and it is only in the latter rare cases where no crime has been committed in pursuance of a criminal conspiracy that sanction to initiate proceedings is necessary as some safeguard against frivolous prosecution. But the prosecution in this case alleges that an offence has been committed and further that it has been committed in pursuance of a conspiracy. No sanction to initiate prosecution for a substantive offence is ever required. That is an elementary rule of law. All that is necessary here is that the proper section (S. 109, I. P. C.) should be applied to the facts and that the misuse of S. 120-B should be pointed out. I dismiss this petition with a direction that the charge be now suitably amended.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 455 of 1936, Decided on 20th August 1937, from decree of Dist. Munsif, Chingleput, D/- 29th November 1935.

Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 68 — Claim by mortgagee to money decree only on personal covenant — Court has no power to insist upon his filing mortgage suit.

Where a portion of the mortgaged property is sold in revenue sale by reason of the mortgagors' default and the mortgagee brings a suit for money decree on the personal covenant, the Court has no power to insist upon his filing a mortgage suit even when he does not wish to have a mortgage decree. Order.—The order of the lower Court is obviously unsustainable. The plaintiff sued for money due on a hypothecation bond but he limited his claim to a money decree on the personal covenant, stating that as the mortgaged properties had been sold away in a revenue sale by reason of the mortgagors' default, he did not wish to take proceedings to enforce the security and was content with a money decree. The lower Court found that only one of the items had been sold but not the other items; in this view, it held that the proper course for the plaintiff was to file a suit to enforce the mortgage as against the other item. This view seems to me to have been proceeded on a misapprehension of the relevant provisions of the Transfer of Property Act.

If the case is viewed as one falling under Cl. (c) of S. 68, T. P. Act, the plaintiff will have an unconditional right to sue for money, but even taking it that the case falls either under Cl. (a) or Cl. (b) of S. 68, the second clause gives the power to the Court to stay a personal action only in the event of the mortgagee not abandoning his security. The Court has certainly no power to insist upon his filing a mortgage suit even when he does not wish to have a mortgage decree. The dismissal of the suit was therefore not warranted by law. I do not find that there is any other question remaining to be tried in the case, as the lower Court has held that the debt is binding on defendants 3 to 6 as a family debt.

The result will be that the decree of the lower Court is set aside and a decree passed in plaintiff's favour personally against defendant 2 (as defendant 1 is reported to have since died), also against the assets of defendant 1, if any, in the hands of defendant 3 and against the interests, if any, of defendants 3 to 6 in the joint family properties belonging to themselves and to defendants 1 and 2 for the plaint amount with interest on Rupees 100 at 6 per cent. per annum from the date of plaint up to date of payment. Plaintiff will be entitled to his costs both here and in the Court below.

Second Appeal No. 722 of 1933, Decided on 27th April 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, Anantapur, in A. S. No. 28 of 1930.

(a) Evidence—Admission—Judge when considering weight of admission cannot ignore it merely on guess of his own.

A Judge when asked to consider the weight of an admission by a party cannot ignore it on some guess of his own without plea or explanation by the party making the admission. [P 134 C 1]

(b) Adverse Possession — Co-sharers — Co-sharer not asserting exclusive title in himself but claiming title only to his own share—No ouster of other co-sharer.

Where a co-sharer claiming adverse possession against other co-sharer has never asserted exclusive title in himself to the knowledge of the other co-sharer and has only claimed title to his own share in the property, there is no ouster of the other co-sharer and the plea of adverse possession cannot prevail. [P 134 C 2]

(c) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 106 — On dissolution partners settling accounts — Effect.

Where on a dissolution the partners settle the accounts of the partnership between themselves, there is no longer any question of a suit for dissolution and accounts within the meaning of Art. 106 : A I R 1922 P C 115, Rel. on; 11 I C 288, Disting. [P 135 C 1]

(d) Registration — Dissolution of partnership and division of immovable properties — Document evidencing it is not transfer from partnership to individual partners and does not require registration — Where however such document vests immovable properties in proportions different from interests held by partners during subsistence of partnership, it may require registration.

To speak of a transfer of title from the partnership to the partners individually as the reason for insisting upon the registration of a document evidencing dissolution and division of immovable properties, is not a correct way of putting it; because a partnership is not a legal entity like an incorporated body and during the subsistence of the partnership the title to immovable properties brought into the partnership or purchased with its funds vests in the partners and not in the partnership as such. It follows from the provisions in S. 253, Contract Act, that all immovable property purchased with partnership funds must be deemed to be held by the partners as joint owners. Though such document is not a transfer from the partnership to the individual partners, where a settlement arrived at on a dissolution vests the immovable properties of the partnership in the former partners in proportions very different from the interests held by them during the subsistence of the partnership, a question of registration may arise in such cases : A I R 1931 Mad 580, Ref. [P 135 C 2; P 136 C 1]

Judgment.—This second appeal arises out of a suit for the recovery of the plaintiff's one-third share in certain items of immovable property and for incidental relief. It is the plaintiffs' case that his deceased brother Yerikalappan, defendant 2, and Nettekallappan, the father of defendant 1, were partners in an abkari business from 1892 to 1904, that out of the funds of that business they purchased the suit properties, that in 1904 there was a dissolution and settlement of accounts between them evidenced by Ex. A, that under that arrangement, provision was made for the discharge of debts and for division of the outstandings and that as regards the immovable properties which had been purchased with the funds of the partnership, the three partners agreed that they should be entitled to the same in equal shares. The plaint adds that for many years after the date of the Ex. A, Yerikalappa and after his death the plaintiff as his surviving brother were receiving his one-third share of the income of the suit properties. The plaint prayed for division of the immovable properties thus held in common. Defendant 1 who is the principal contesting defendant, pleaded ignorance of the alleged partnership and of all that is said to have happened in 1904, though in the written statement some kind of reference is made to a dissolution 25 years ago. The positive case put forward on behalf of defendant 1 was that the items now claimed by the plaintiff to be the common properties of the partners were the self acquisitions or separate properties of defendant 1's father and defendant 1 also raised pleas of limitation and adverse possession.

A number of issues were framed in the case and they were substantially decided in the plaintiffs' favour by the first Court which gave him a decree for partition. On appeal the learned District Judge reversed the trial Court's decree and dismissed the suit partly on certain grounds of law and partly on what may best be described as a mixed finding. Hence this second appeal by the plaintiff. So far as the lower Appellate Court's judgment can be described as embodying a finding of fact, such finding is based on such an obviously erroneous approach to the case that I am unable to accept it as a finding binding on me.

The learned District Judge accepts the existence of the partnership alleged in the plaint and its dissolution in 1904 and also seems to agree with the trial Court's view that the items of immovable property now claimed were purchased with the funds of that partnership. Though with reference to Ex. A he makes some observations suggesting a feeling of distrust in his mind, I do not read them as throwing any doubt on the genuineness of Ex. A, because defendant 1 himself accepts its genuineness. What seems to have oppressed the learned Judge is that in spite of Ex. A defendant 1's father was allowed to have the properties registered in his own name during all the time that he lived, i. e. up to 1918 and that he was allowed to enjoy the properties exclusively. The strongest disproof of the exclusive enjoyment or exclusive title of defendant 1's family is the admitted partition deed Ex. D in that family which proceeds on the footing that the family had only a third share in these items; and without any conceivable reason or explanation the learned Judge brushes it aside with the remark that the recital in Ex. D that defendant 1's family was entitled only to a third share in those properties might be due to the ignorance of defendant 1 as to the exact properties to which he and his father are entitled. Defendant 1 never pleaded ignorance and till he came into the witness box he had never suggested that there has been any mistake in this respect in Ex. D. Even when he was put questions about Ex. D, he nonchalantly pretended ignorance that there was any such statement in Ex. D. It passes my comprehension how the learned Judge when asked to consider the weight of an admission of that kind by a party could ignore it on some guess of his own without any plea or explanation by the party making the admission.

If it were necessary for the case, I should be prepared to say that Ex. D is the strongest proof that defendant 1's family must have been giving to the other two sharers their shares of the income; but it is not necessary for the purpose of the case to come to any such finding. It is sufficient to rely upon Ex. D for two purposes (1) to repel all suspicion which the learned Judge gratuitously casts on Ex. A, because so late as in 1921 Ex. D asserts just the one-third right which Ex. A gave to defendant 1's family and (2) to negative the plea of adverse possession; defendant 1 candidly admits in the witness box that he never asserted any exclusive title in himself to the knowledge of the plaintiff and in the face of the claim of a title only to one-third in Ex. D it is impossible to hold that defendant 1 who was only a co-tenant could ever have proved ouster of the plaintiff.

The learned Judge's suspicion against Ex. A seems to have been excited by the disappearance of the later pages in Ex. A. No question has been put suggesting any particular hypothesis as to this disappearance. In the very nature of things, the book could not have been in the plaintiff's custody from the outset and so long as the genuineness of Ex. A is undisputed, it seems to me immaterial for the purpose of the decision of the questions raised in this case, what happened in the course of the later business said to have been carried on in partnership between the plaintiff and defendant 1's father. If defendant 1 had pleaded that in connexion with the later partnership the rights of the parties as settled at the time of Ex. A had been changed, I can understand a comment about the disappearance of the later pages in Ex. A or the non-production of the accounts relating to the later partnership. Neither in the written statement nor in his evidence did defendant 1 put forward any such case. His whole case was that the property was from the very beginning the separate property of his father except as regards a one-third in certain items in respect of which the case as put forward through D. W. 2 was that the plaintiff's brother gave it up some time in 1901. This last story is clearly disproved by Ex. A. In this state of the pleadings, I am unable to appreciate the learned Judge's criticism against the plaintiff's case on the ground that the Court has not been put in possession of any information as to what happened in connexion with the later partnership. Neither party made these later transactions any part of the case and the plaintiff was therefore not called upon to adduce any information about what happened during that later partnership. Knowing something of the habits of the people of this country, I am unable to attach any importance to the registry in the revenue records in defendant 1's father's sole name or to the issue of patta in his name. In the face of Ex. D, these considerations seem to me very slender to base any argument upon. I have therefore no doubt that defendant 1, on whom the onus should properly be laid of disproving the continuance of the title evidenced by Ex. A, has wholly failed to discharge that onus and that on that ground the finding of the trial Court in plaintiff's favour on the question of title should be restored.

The learned District Judge has also decided against the plaintiff on two points of law (1) a question of limitation and (2) a point of registration. So far as the decision on the question of limitation is concerned, I am unable to accept the learned Judge's conclusion that Art. 106 is any bar to the maintainability of the present suit. In 45 Mad 378[1] the Privy Council recognize the possibility that on a dissolution the partners may settle the accounts of the partnership between themselves. If that has been done, there is no longer any question of a suit for dissolution and accounts within the meaning of Art. 106. That is just what happened in this case. Ex. A is admittedly a memorandum drawn up on the dissolution of the partnership and embodying the settlement between the partners as to their respective rights on settlement of the accounts of that partnership. I fail to see how any question of Art. 106 arises after that stage.

The decision in 11 I C 288[2] cited before me by the learned counsel for the respondent is clearly distinguishable. In that case, there had been no settlement of accounts between the partners after dissolution and the suit itself was brought as one for dissolution and taking of accounts. The Court however found that by reason of the death of one of the partners, the partnership had become dissolved in law more than three years before the institution of the suit. It was therefore obviously a case in which the accounts of a dissolved partnership had to be taken. To such a suit Art. 106 clearly applies. An attempt was then made to dissociate so much of the plaintiff's claim as related to certain items of immovable property from the bar under Art. 106. The learned Judges, if I may say so, rightly held that such a dissociation was impossible. It was not a suit governed by Art. 142 or Art. 144; the immovable properties were claimed on the very ground that they formed part of the partnership assets and where the accounts had not been taken, no Court could grant relief in respect of some items alone of the partnership without taking the accounts of the partnership as a whole. It is in those circumstances that the learned Judges observed that a right to a division of the house could not be established until after a full account had been taken of all the partnership assets and, as a suit for the latter purpose was barred, it was not possible to grant any independent relief in respect of the items of immovable properties alone.

The objection under the Registration Act has caused me greater difficulty, not on the particular ground adopted by the learned District Judge but on a somewhat different ground. The learned District Judge speaks of a transfer of title from the partnership to the partners individually as the reason for insisting upon the registration of Ex. A. That perhaps is not a correct way of putting it; because a partnership is not a legal entity like an incorporated body and during the subsistence of the partnership the title to immovable properties brought into the partnership or purchased with its funds vests in the partners and not in the partnership as such. As pointed out in 55 Mad 72[3], it follows from the provisions in S. 253, Contract Act, that all immovable property purchased with partnership funds must be deemed to be held by the partners as joint owners. Though Ex. A is therefore not a transfer from the partnership to the individual partners, there can be no doubt that a settlement arrived at on a dissolution might vest the immovable properties of the partnership in the former partners in proportions very different from the interests held by them during the subsistence of the partnership. S. 253 (1), Contract Act, provides that the share of each partner in the partnership property is the value of his original contribution increased or diminished by his share of profit or loss.

It would thus follow that while partners may be joint owners of the partnership property, they need not necessarily be owners in equal shares. On a dissolution, when the partners settle their affairs, they may either allot to one or other of them particular items in entirety or in varying shares, not necessarily in the particular proportion of the share of each partner in the whole partnership property. There is much to be said in favour of the view taken in 55 Mad 72[3] that a question of registration may arise in such cases, though there is also authority to the contrary. If in the present case there was anything to suggest that the arrangement under Ex. A gave to various partners shares in immovable property different from the shares which they held prior to the dissolution, the question of registration of Ex. A might have been a more serious difficulty in the plaintiff's way. But there has been no suggestion anywhere that during the partnership stage the partners were not entitled to equal shares and if all that happened at the time of Ex. A was that their respective rights and the liabilities were fixed in particular ways as regards the moveable assets and that as regards the immovable property, they continued to hold the same shares in them as they had prior to the dissolution, I do not feel that I am bound to reject Ex. A on the ground of non-registration. Under S. 45, T. P. Act, the presumption in the case of the co-owners, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is that they held the property in equal shares and that is just what Ex. A provides for. It is on this narrow ground that I have come to the conclusion that Ex. A is not inadmissible on the ground of want of registration.

I accordingly allow the second appeal and setting aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court restore the decree of the District Munsif with costs here and in the lower Appellate Court, payable by defendant 1. (Leave granted).

Appeal No. 229 of 1932, Decided on 23rd April 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Salem, in O. S. No. 19 of 1930.

(a) Hindu Law—Joint family—Self acquisition—Self acquired property may become joint family property if thrown in common stock - Onus lies upon person pleading that separate property ceased to be so to prove it —Mere circumstance that there is no evidence to show how separate income and joint family income were dealt with by member is no ground to hold that property is not separate.

The property which was originally the separate self acquired property of a member of a Hindu joint family may become joint family property if it has been thrown by him into the common stock with the intention of abandoning all separate claims upon it. The onus lies on the person who pleads that such separate property of a member of a joint Hindu family has at some later stage ceased to be so, to establish that it has been so dealt with as to lose its separate character. The mere circumstance that it is not known how the separate income of the member and the income from the ancestral property were dealt with by the member of the joint Hindu family cannot be a ground on which it can be held that the properties are not his separate properties. To hold that because of that fact he must be presumed to have mingled the two incomes so as to lose his right over his own earnings will amount to practically throwing the onus on the wrong person: A I R 1930 Lah 613, Dissent.; 25 Mad 351; A I R 1936 Mad 177; A I R 1927 Mad 676 and A. S. Nos. 363 of 1923 and 47 of 1925, Foll.; 10 Cal 324 (P C), Disting. [P 138 C 2]

(b) Hindu Law—Joint family—Self acquisition—Blending of—There is no presumption in favour of 'blending'—Presumption if any can only be one of fact drawn from surrounding circumstances.

The Hindu law no doubt recognizes "blending' and attaches to such blending certain legal consequences. But there is no presumption in favour of "blending". The presumption if any can only be one of fact to be drawn in the light of all the surrounding circumstances and in accordance with what is described in S. 114, Evidence Act, as the common course of human conduct. [P 139 C 1]

(c) Hindu Law—Joint family—Self acquisition—Blending of—Trustee mixing his own funds with the funds of the cestui que trust and 'doctrine of blending' distinguished.

In the case of a trustee mixing his own funds with the funds of the cestui que trust, the law only casts upon the trustee the onus of proving what his own funds are and distinguishing them from the funds of the cestui que trust. It is only if he is unable to do so that a presumption in favour of the trust in respect of the whole fund is drawn. On the other hand, the result of the doctrine of blending is that the whole property becomes as a matter of law impressed with the character of joint property. [P 139 C 2]

(d) Will—Validity—Presumption.

Every reasonable presumption must be made in favour of validating the will as far as possible rather than in favour of invalidating it. [P 140 C 1]

(e) Election—Minor—It is better that Court itself should hold enquiry as to what is beneficial to minor, following English practice.

Where minors have to elect either to stand by the will of their father or repudiate it on account of the fact that they are not entitled to certain benefits given to them if they should repudiate the will, it would be better, following the English practice, that the Court itself holds an enquiry as to what is most beneficial to the minors in the circumstances and decides accordingly : (1866) 2 Eq 481, Rel. on. [P 140 C 2]

B. Sitarama Rao — for Respondents.

Varadachariar J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for partition of the estate of one Subbaraya Mudaliar, who died in December 1927. The minor plaintiffs are the sons of Subbaraya's third wife Defendant 1 is the son of his first wife and defendants 2 and 3 are the sons of his second wife. Subbaraya executed a will (Ex. 1) on 17th October 1927 whereby he disposed of all the properties, moveable and immovable which he then had, partly in favour of the plaintiffs and partly in favour of the defendants. It is sufficient to say that he allotted to the plaintiffs a house and Rs. 6,000 in cash. The plaintiffs' advisers apparently felt that there was an unequal division of the estate and thought fit to institute this suit for partition on the footing that all the properties in Subbaraya's possession were joint family properties and that the will was accordingly invalid. The learned Subordinate Judge has upheld the contention of the plaintiffs and decreed a general partition. Hence this appeal by the defendants.

A point was taken before the lower Court that Ex. 1 was not duly executed by Subbaraya. This formed the subject of Issue 2; the learned Subordinate Judge has found that the will was duly executed by Subbaraya in a sound disposing state of mind. The only question therefore that was argued before us is that raised by Issue 1, namely, "whether any of the plaint properties are the self acquisition of the deceased Subbaraya Mudaliar." On behalf of the appellants, Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer made a point that the lower Court had really proceeded on a theory of blending or throwing into the common stock which was not the case made in the plaint. Mr. Sitarama Rao pointed out in reply that no such objection had been raised in the grounds of appeal nor any surprise pleaded. Apart from this, however, we are not quite sure that the learned Subordinate Judge has proceeded on a theory of throwing into common stock. His observation in para. 17 of the judgment rather suggests that it was his view that Subbaraya's purchases and investments were never his self acquisitions, because he never kept his earnings separate from the income derived from the joint family properties. As we have however heard the case fully on the merits, it does not seem to us necessary to consider whether really there has been any departure from the case made on the pleadings.

In the plaint it was alleged in para. 4 that at a partition made 12 years before, there was a division of moveables, cash, money lending etc., and that some time later, that is in February 1920, there was a partition of immovable properties between Subbaraya and his father and his brother. The obvious intention of this paragraph when taken with para. 5 was to suggest that the outstandings which belonged to Subbaraya's estate at the time of his death really represented the development of the money lending business which came to Subbaraya at the partition. The plaint makes no reference anywhere to Subbaraya having had any substantial earnings of his own apart from the income yielded by the immovable properties or any other properties that came to him at the partition.

The learned Subordinate Judge has found that Subbaraya was making a very substantial income from his profession as a native medical practitioner and that finding has not been challenged before us. He has also found that at the partition between Subbaraya and his coparceners, Subbaraya obtained only certain immovable properties and did not obtain any cash or share in the money lending business. The evidence also shows that the annual income from the immovable properties which Subbaraya got at the partition was somewhere below Rs. 200 per annum. It is not disputed that Subbaraya married three wives and had a large family to maintain. He had at least five sons and a daughter and two of his wives were alive for a long time. There can be little doubt that the maintenance of the family alone must have cost a great deal more than the income derived from what may be described as the ancestral properties that came to Subbaraya at the partition. The learned Subordinate Judge therefore rightly holds that Subbaraya's income from his profession as a native physician must have contributed largely to the accumulation of wealth. He nevertheless held that as Subbaraya maintained no accounts and it did not appear that even otherwise he made any distinction between his self acquisitions and the joint family properties or between the income derived from the joint family properties and the income derived from the practice of his own profession, he must have confused or blended the two incomes so as to make the two indistinguishable from each other with the result that all his properties must be held to be joint family properties.

The above conclusion has been attacked before us by the learned counsel for the appellants. It does not seem to us necessary to refer at length to the relevant authorities because many of them have been referred to and discussed in recent judgments of this Court, particularly in 43 M L W 302[1] and 50 Mad 582,[2] and the unreported judgment of Ramesam and Jackson JJ. in A. S. Nos. 363 of 1923 and 47 of 1925. We may take the statement of the law in para. 227 of Mulla's book as representing the result of the authorities, namely that:

> Property which was originally the separate or self-acquired property of a member of a joint family may become joint family property if it has been voluntarily thrown by him into the common stock with the intention of abandoning all separate claims upon it.

The author adds that a clear intention to waive his separate rights must be established. It has been suggested by Mr. Sitarama Rao that the present case is not exactly the one covered by this rule, because he argues that he does not concede that any of the suit properties was at any time the self acquired property of Subbaraya. We do not think that that way of stating the question really solves the problem. It cannot be denied that Subbaraya's earnings at the moment they came into his hands were his separate property and that he had absolute power of disposal over them. That is certainly a stage which the plaintiffs must admit. No doubt they tried to avoid even that problem by suggesting in the plaint that all that Subbaraya possessed at his death must have come out of the immovable properties and the cash and money lending business that he got for his share at a partition and, as we have already said, the plaint wholly ignored Subbaraya's independent earnings. But on the facts as now found the plaintiffs cannot get away from the fact that Subbaraya starts with a large amount of money in his hands which at the initial stage were undoubtedly at his absolute disposal and were not derived from the joint property. It is true that he had a small income every year from the ancestral properties as well. It is also true that Subbaraya kept no accounts and we are not therefore in a position to say either that he brought both sets of income into one account or that he did not. If, as the authorities suggest, the onus lies upon the person who pleads that what was at any particular moment the separate property of a member of the joint Hindu family has at some later stage ceased to be so to establish that it has been so dealt with as to lose its separate character, it does not appear to us that the plaintiffs can succeed merely upon the circumstances that we do not know how Subbaraya dealt with the two sets of income. It will be practically throwing the onus on the wrong person to hold that because we do not know how he dealt with the two sets of income, he must be presumed to have mingled them so as to lose his rights over his own earnings. Our attention has been drawn to the observations of the Lahore High Court in A I R 1930 Lah 613[3] at p. 617, to the following effect:

> In the absence of any evidence that he was keeping his self acquisitions strictly separate, the presumption is that the whole income of the family from whatever source derived went into the common chest out of which the family was maintained and some of the members were married.

We are, with great respect, unable to accept this presumption as well founded. The expression "the whole income of the family" used by the learned Judges in the passage above quoted is somewhat ambiguous. It looks as if the learned Judges meant what each member of the family or any member of the family was earning. If so, we are not aware of any warrant for laying down a general presumption in the form enunciated by the learned Judges. It is not contended by Mr. Sitarama Rao that there is any presumption of Hindu law to that effect. It is one thing to say that the Hindu law recognizes 'blending' and attaches to such blending certain legal consequences, but it is another thing to say that there is any presumption in favour of blending. We would respectfully say that we are aware of no authority in favour of such a presumption. The presumption, if any, can only be one of fact to be drawn in the light of all surrounding circumstances and in accordance with what is described in S. 114, Evidence Act, as the common course of human conduct. Dealing with the income derived by a Hindu widow from her husband's estate, it was laid down as early as 25 Mad 351[4] that the reasonable presumption to make in respect of any person having income at his or her absolute disposal is that he or she intended to reserve to himself or herself that power of disposal unless there is evidence to the contrary. This aspect of the matter has been emphasised in the unreported judgment of Ramesam and Jackson JJ., already referred to and we need not labour it.

A decision of a Bench of this Court in A I R 1928 Mad 561,[5] may perhaps be said to state the position in terms somewhat favourable to Mr. Sitarama Rao's contention. The learned Judges in that case were prepared to draw an inference that a brother-in-law who had earnings of his own intended to throw his earnings into the stock from the fact that he was contributing to the maintenance of his deceased's brother's widow not merely from the income of the admitted joint family property but even from his own earnings. It is not for us to say whether as an inference of fact the learned Judges were justified in drawing such an inference or not, but it seems to us to put the matter too high to say, as the learned Offg. C. J. said, that mingling a portion of one fund with another fund raises a presumption not merely in respect of the portions mixed but also in respect of the balance of the earnings in the hands of the acquirer. We venture to think that the presumption to be drawn in the circumstances of the present case do not warrant the necessary inference which the learned Subordinate Judge felt obliged to draw from the absence of accounts showing that Subbaraya kept his earning separate from the income derived by him from the joint family property.

Mr. Sitarama Rao called in aid the analogy of a trustee mixing his own funds with the funds of the cestui que trust; we do not think that that is a true analogy. In those cases the law only casts upon the trustee the onus of proving what his own funds are and distinguishing them from the funds of the cestui que trust. It is only if he is unable to do so that a presumption in favour of the trust in respect of the whole fund is drawn. On the other hand, the result of the doctrine of blending is that the whole property becomes as a matter of law impressed with the character of joint property. It was also suggested that as Subbaraya must have been receiving something like Rs. 200 every year from the joint family property, that amount might have gone into some of the assets that existed at his death. But if he has been spending very much more than that amount on the maintenance of the joint family, there is no reason to presume that his separate moneys were spent on the maintenance of the family and that the income from the joint family went into the investments. Whatever may be the position, when the income from joint funds might have left a surplus over the requirements of the joint family, it does not seem to us necessary or reasonable to draw the inference, even where the income from the joint property is far below the requirements of the family, that the investments made by the earning member were made in whole or in part out of the joint income. If the matter rested on presumptions alone, we should have held that the plaintiffs had not made out that the subsequent acquisitions of Subbaraya were either joint property or had been thrown into the joint stock.

Mr. Sitarama Rao however relied on two items of conduct (1) that Subbaraya had dealt with both sets of properties on the same footing in his will and (2) that one item of immovable property which Subbaraya got at the partition had been sold by him in 1926 under Ex. 9 for Rs. 1,000 out of which Rs. 300 is admittedly traceable to a hypothecation bond now in existence and nothing is known of the balance of Rs. 700. So far as the circumstances first mentioned are concerned, the vakil who drafted Ex. 1 has spoken to the conversation between himself and Subbaraya in connection with the inclusion of the ancestral properties in the will. They are undoubtedly of very small value as compared to Subbaraya's acquisitions and we see no reason to think that the explanation given by the witness does not represent the truth. Even otherwise the mere fact that Subbaraya might have made a mistake in assuming that he could dispose of the joint family properties by a will when he was giving them to his own sons does not justify the inference that he intended to lose his power even over his self acquired properties. Every reasonable presumption must be made in favour of validating the will as far as possible rather than in favour of invalidating it. We are therefore not prepared to draw an inference adverse to the appellants from the manner in which Subbaraya dealt with the two sets of properties in his will. The observations in 10 Cal 324[6] at p. 337 which Mr. Sitarama Rao relied on in this connection must be read in the light of the facts found in that case and with due regard to the circumstance that at that time the prevailing view in respect of a Hindu widow's savings and investments was more strongly in favour of the theory of "accretion" to the husband's estate than has been laid down in later authorities. The decisive facts in that case were that the widow's purchases consisted of "shares of lands in which the husband was a share holder to a larger extent" and the purchases were made within a short time after the husband's death.

As regards the proceeds of the sale under Ex. 9, the plaintiffs are no doubt entitled to contend that the hypothecation for Rs. 300 must be treated as joint family property But we do not think that the inability of defendant 1 to explain what Subbaraya did with the remaining Rs. 700 can be used against the defendants. Defendant 1 was not a party to Ex. 9 and there is nothing to suggest that he has kept back any information in his possession. The plaintiffs' advisers are aware of Subbaraya's investments as they are specified in the will, and if by proximity of time or by other means it had been possible to suggest any connection between this sum of Rs. 700 and any of Subbaraya's investments, the position might have been different. For aught we know, Subbaraya might have spent away the said sum of Rs. 700. We do not think therefore that that circumstance suggests any inference in plaintiff's favour.

The result is that the decree of the lower Court cannot be sustained in the form in which it has been passed. Likewise, the claim for partition of all the properties left by the deceased Subbaraya is not maintainable. As Subbaraya's will comprises joint family properties as well as properties which we have held to be self-acquired, and as the plaintiffs have under that will been given certain benefits which they may not be entitled to retain if they prefer to repudiate the will, they must elect either to stand by the will or to repudiate it. We allowed the matter to stand over for some time to see if the plaintiffs' next friend is able to do anything in the matter. But their learned counsel represents that as the next friend is a woman, it will be better, if following the English practice, the Court itself holds an enquiry as to what is most beneficial to the minors in the circumstances and decides accordingly : see (1866) 2 Eq 481,[7] and also the passage in Mulla's Transfer of Property Act, p. 157. We must accordingly call upon the lower Court to make an enquiry after giving notice to both parties and ascertain whether it will be more advantageous for the plaintiffs to confirm the will and take the benefits conferred upon them by the will or to repudiate the will and limit their claim to a partition of such of the properties as according to the directions above contained must be held to be joint family properties. The report will be submitted before 10th January 1937, 10 days for objections. (The report and the final judgment are not necessary for purposes of this report.)

Appeal No. 52 of 1935, Decided on 1st September 1937, against decree of City Civil Judge, Madras, in O. S. No. 169 of 1933.

Mahomedan Law—Legitimacy — Marriage with living wife's sister—Children of such marriage are legitimate.

Marriage by a Mahomedan with his living wife's sister is invalid and not void. If such a marriage is consummated, the children born of such marriage are legitimate : A I R 1917 Bom 211, Rel. on ; 23 Cal 130, Dissent. [P 141 C 2 ; P 142 C 1]

A. B. Nambiar and Rafiuddin Ahmed — for Respondents.

Leach C. J. — This appeal raises the question whether a child of a marriage contracted by Mahomedan with his wife's sister, the wife being alive, is legitimate. It also raises questions with regard to the right of certain parties to payments on account of mahr. The suit was filed by the appellant for the administration of the estate of her deceased father, Syed Mahomed Saheb, a Sunni Mahomedan, who died in Madras on 17th July 1930. There were ten defendants, a widow and the sons and daughters of the deceased. Respondent 1 is the widow. The appellant and respondent 3 are the children of the deceased's first wife, who predeceased him. Respondents 2, 5, 6, 8 and 10 are the sons and daughters of respondent 1 by the deceased. Respondents 4 and 9 are the children of the third wife, who also predeceased her husband. Respondent 7 is the son of the fifth wife, who survived the husband, but died before the suit was instituted. Respondent 1 was his fourth wife, and she and the fifth wife were sisters. It is contended by the appellant that respondent 7, who is the son of the younger sister, is illegitimate, his mother having married the deceased while her sister was alive. It is said that the Mahomedan law prohibits a Mahomedan marrying his wife's sister and if he does take her as a wife her children have no share in the inheritance. Defendant 7 denies that he is illegitimate and therefore claims to be entitled to share in the estate of his deceased father. The learned trial Judge held that the marriage was irregular, but that this did not affect the legitimacy of defendant 7. With regard to the matter of mahr, the claimants are respondents 1 and 7, respondent 1 claiming in her own right and respondent 7 as his mother's heir. The learned Judge held that they were each entitled to a sum of Rs. 585 by way of mahr. The appellant says that they are entitled to nothing.

The question whether a Mahomedan may marry the wife's sister during the lifetime of his wife has been considered by the Calcutta High Court and by the Bombay High Court and they have arrived at different conclusions. The Calcutta case is that in 23 Cal 130,[1] and the Bombay case, that in 41 Bom 485.[2] The Calcutta decision stands alone, but the Bombay decision has the support of all the principal modern works on Mahomedan Law. The Calcutta High Court holds that a Mahomedan cannot lawfully marry his wife's sister, and that if he has marital relations with his sister-in-law during his wife's lifetime, the children born of the union are illegitimate. This decision is largely based on a passage from the Koran. The Koran does prohibit a man marrying his wife's sister, as it prohibits a man marrying his wife's daughter. The Bombay High Court considers that Mahomedan law recognizes a difference between a marriage which is void from the beginning and can never become lawful and a marriage with a person who may later become a lawful wife. In the case of a marriage with a wife's sister, the marriage would become lawful on the divorce or death of the wife. This view finds acceptance in the Fatwa-i-Alamgiri, which is of undoubted authority. It dates from about the middle of 17th century. Beaman J. in 41 Bom 485[2] gives it the place in the Mahomedan law which the Institutes of Justinian occupy in Roman law and points out that it was written when Mahomedanism was at the height of its power in this country. Modern text books, as I have indicated, are unanimous on the question. In Edition 2 of Baillie's Digest, the following passage appears at p. 157 of Part 1 :

An invalid marriage has no legal effect before consummation ; so that if a man should marry a woman by a contract which is invalid by reason of his having previously touched her mother with desire, and should then relinquish the wife, he might lawfully marry the mother. But after consummation it is joined to valid marriages as to its effects, one of which is the establishment of nusub or the child's paternity, as already mentioned.

The editor of Edn. 5 of "Wilson's Anglo-Mahomedan Law" accepts the Bombay decision although Sir Roland Wilson himself favoured the contrary opinion. Ameer Ali states the position as follows (Edn. 4, Vol. 2, p. 326) :

Thus a man may not marry two sisters or a woman and her niece by the same contract or one after another whilst the previous marriage is subsisting. But if such a marriage is contracted in fact, it is invalid (fasid) but not void (batil), for the prior marriage may become dissolved at any time by the death or divorce of one of them and thus validate the second union. Accordingly, although the Judge may separate the parties on the ground of the invalidity of the marriage, if it is consummated the issue would be affiliated to the father, in other words they would be his legitimate children.

This opinion is emphasised at p. 391. In Edn. 10 of Mulla (p. 179) it is said that the bar of unlawful conjunction renders a marriage irregular, not void, and at p. 180 there is express dissent from the Calcutta decision. In view of this weight of authority, we feel bound to accept the Bombay decision as being correct. While it is true that the Koran does prohibit a man marrying the sister of his wife during her lifetime, it is clear that this passage in the Koran has never been read as declaring the children of such a marriage to be illegitimate. In fact no writer on Mahomedan law has ever suggested that in the case of an invalid marriage, as opposed to a void marriage, the children are illegitimate. Of course where a Mahomedan marries a person contrary to law, and it is not possible in any set of circumstances for that union to become regular, the issue would not be legitimate. The present case is one where the marriage was against the law when it was contracted but it was capable of becoming a valid marriage and therefore was valid so far as respondent 7 is concerned. For these reasons we consider that the decision of the learned trial Judge on the question of legitimacy of respondent 7 was correct.

With regard to the question of mahr the position is very unsatisfactory. It is impossible on the evidence to say whether anything is due. Respondent 7 in fact made no claim in his written statement to his mother's mahr ; but he was allowed to raise the question in the course of argument. We consider that as this question of mahr was not dealt with adequately by the learned advocates in the Court below, it will be better to send the case back for further evidence on the question whether respondents 1 and 7 are entitled to payments on account of mahr and on the question of the amounts. Accordingly the decree of the lower Court will, so far as it affects the matter of mahr, be set aside and the case remanded for re-trial on this question. Leave will be granted to defendant 7 to amend his written statement so as to make it quite clear that he is claiming to have paid out to him the money which he says was due to his mother on account of mahr. As the appeal has succeeded in part and has failed in part, we propose to make no order as to costs.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 1509 of 1935, Decided on 20th January 1937, from decree of Sub.Judge, Tenali, D/. 18th April 1935.

Provincial Insolvency Act (5 of 1920), S. 78 — 'Proved debt' — Inclusion of debt by insolvent in his petition of insolvency does not make it proved.

Mere inclusion of a debt by the insolvent in the schedule of debts filed by him along with the insolvency petition does not make the debt 'proved'; it is at the most a debt 'provable': AIR 1934 Mad 465, Foll. [P 143 C 1]

G. Chandrasekhara Sastry — for Petitioner.

V. Viswanatha Sastry — for Respondents.

Order.—Section 78 (2), Provincial Insolvency Act only applies to debts "proved" under the Act, and not to debts "provable". The facts of the case here as I understand them are that the defendant filed an insolvency petition on 5th March 1930 and was adjudicated on 5th September 1930. Subsequently the adjudication was annulled on 31st August 1932. The date of the promissory note is 4th November 1928. Therefore unless S. 78 (2) can be relied upon by the creditor, the claim in the suit was barred by limitation. The facts appear to be that all that was done with regard to the suit debt was that it was included by the insolvent in his schedule and nothing more. The learned Subordinate Judge holds that the debt was thereby "proved" relying on a Calcutta decision and overlooking the decision in 57 Mad 767.[1] He also adds in further support of his view that he cannot imagine any better proof of the debt than its admission by the insolvent by his including it in his schedule of debts. That no doubt is some evidence of the existence of the debt, but nevertheless the question still remains as to whether or not the debt has been "proved" under the Act. In my view the debt is not proved under the Act by its mere inclusion in the schedule of the insolvent. The matter has been fully dealt with in my own judgment in 57 Mad 767[1] and it is quite clear from it that such a debt as this is at the most debt "provable" in the insolvency and not a debt "proved". The lower Court was therefore wrong in its conclusion and the decree of the lower Court is therefore reversed and the suit dismissed as being barred by limitation. The C. R. P. is allowed with costs here and in the lower Court.

WADSWORTH J.

In re S. T. Nambi Chetty — Insolvent.

Petition No. 453 of 1936, Decided on 6th September 1937.

 Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (1909), S. 49 (3)—Proposal of Official Assignee to pay financing creditor 25 % of net realizations from litigation as purchase price and to treat such price as 'costs in administration' is neither against law nor impracticable.

It is lawful for the trustee in bankruptcy (in India the Official Assignee or Receiver) to buy the financial guarantee of one of the creditors by promising him a proportion of the net realisations as the price of his services and to treat the expenditure as a legitimate part of the cost of getting in the assets of the estate. [P 144 C 1]

The proposal of the Official Assignee that the indemnifying creditor shall be promised 25 % of the net realisations to the estate from a certain litigation as the purchase price for his assistance and that this price shall be treated as "costs of administration" under S. 49 (3) and that all the creditors including the indemnifying creditor shall share rateably in the balance of the realisations, is in effect a scheme whereby the Official Assignee, just as he buys the services of an advocate and debits the estate, may buy the services of guarantor and debit the estate. There is neither legal nor practical objection to such proposal nor is there an offence against the principle of equality of distribution of assets : (1889) 40 Ch D 481, Applied ; A I R 1929 Mad 385, Ref. [P 144 C 1]

Official Assignee in person.

Order.—This application by the Official Assignee relates to a difficult and important question which is constantly arising in insolvency work, namely, how is an individual creditor, who is willing for a consideration to finance and indemnify the Official Assignee in an attack on an alleged fraudulent alienation, to be compensated for the risk which he runs, without offending against the principles on which the insolvency law is based. A former proposal that the financing creditor should be rewarded by having his debt paid in full in priority to the other creditors out of any amount that might be recovered, was disapproved by Venkatasubba Rao J. in 55 M L J 657[1] as being opposed to the policy of equal distribution of assets, though the then Chief Justice in the appeal from that decision (O. S. A. Nos. 100 of 1927 and 5 of 1928) observes that such an arrangement might be unobjectionable if the other creditors consented to it.

In his present report, the Official Assignee suggests another way of attaining the same end and asks for the Court's directions. He desires to attack a purchase by the insolvent in the name of his wife as fraudulent. The creditors as a body are not willing to act and no individual creditor is prepared to run the risk of indemnifying the Official Assignee unless he gets some substantial benefit (in addition to his rateable dividend) out of the proceeds in case of success. This seems to me perfectly reasonable—the creditor who risks having to pay all the costs of failure naturally looks for something more than those who have refused to bear their share of the risk in case of success. All that he will get by way of preferential rights under the Insolvency Rules (O. 6, R. 9) is a first charge on the realisations for any actual disbursements with interest thereon.

1. In re Purushothamdas and Bros., (1929) 16 A I R Mad 385=116 I C 125=55 M L J 657.

Obviously this is not a very powerful inducement to altruistic action. The Official Assignee therefore proposes that the indemnifying creditor shall be promised 25 per cent of the net realisations to the estate from this litigation as the purchase price for his assistance, that this price shall be treated as "costs of administration" under S. 49 (3), Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, and that all the creditors (including, of course, the indemnifying creditor) shall share rateably in the balance of the realisations.

I can see no legal nor practical objection to this proposal. It is in effect a scheme whereby the Official Assignee, just as he buys the services of an advocate and debits the estate, may buy the services of a guarantor and debit the estate. There is no offence against the principle of equality of distribution of assets; all that is proposed is to treat as a legitimate expense to the estate the cost of procuring for the Official Assignee an insurance against the consequences of failure. The scheme is, in fact, very similar to that approved in (1889) 40 Ch D 481,[2] whereby when bankruptcy intervened in the middle of an action by the bankrupt and the trustee was unwilling to incur the risk of continuing it, one of the creditors was permitted to do so at his own expense and risk in return for $\frac{3}{4}$th of the net realisations from the action. It was held that this arrangement offended neither against the law of maintenance nor against the law of bankruptcy.

The only difference between that case and the present proposal is that we are now concerned with a new litigation, not with the continuance of a pending action. This difference does not affect the recognition of the principle, viz. that it is lawful for the trustee in bankruptcy to buy the financial guarantee of one of the creditors by promising him a proportion of the net realisations as the price of his services and to treat this expenditure as a legitimate part of the cost of getting in the assets of the estate. I therefore approve of the Official Assignee's recommendation.

Ch. Raghava Rao and Kothandarama Nainar — for Appellant.

M. Sriramamurthi — for Respondents.

Judgment.—We are unable to support the order of the learned Subordinate Judge in this case. The final decree in O. S. No. 15 of 1926 expressly provides for sale of item 6 to discharge the debt due to defendant 2 (appellant) under his prior mortgage. This is in pursuance of the provision in the preliminary decree declaring that he should be at liberty to apply for the sale of the mortgaged property (item 6). Whether that direction is right or wrong is not a question which can be discussed by a Court executing the decree. It is quite impossible to hold that the decree is merely declaratory of the rights of defendant 2.

As for the point of limitation, it cannot be said that the appellant's application of 21st September 1932 was not an application in accordance with law. There was no obligation on him, under O. 21, R. 11, Civil P. C., to produce a copy of the decree with the application. Under O. 21, R. 11 (3), Civil P. C., the Court required him to produce a copy of the decree. He failed to do so and his application was accordingly rejected on 10th March 1933. His application when made was perfectly "in accordance with law" and the order of 10th March 1933 was the final order on it. His present application dated 16th April 1934 was therefore clearly in time. The appeal is accordingly allowed. The execution application must be restored to file and disposed of according to law. The contesting respondent, the plaintiff, will pay the appellant's costs in both Courts.

Andhra Insurance Co. Ltd., Masulipatam.

O. P. No. 34 of 1937, Decided on 22nd October 1937.

 (a) Income-tax Act (1922), Ss. 22 and 59 —Rules under S. 59, R. 25—Expression 'last preceding valuation' means last preceding valuation at the time of return.

The expression 'last preceding valuation' in R. 25 means the last preceding valuation at the time of return and does not mean the valuation covering the last valuation period terminating before 1st April of the year of assessment. [P 146 C 1]

An insurance company made valuation of its profits every four years. The first valuation was made in December 1930 and was for the period 1926-1929. The next valuation took place in December 1934 and was for the period 1930-1933. The company made return of its income in June 1934 based on the valuation covering the period 1926-1929 :

Held* that as the last preceding valuation when the return was submitted was the valuation covering the period 1926-1929, the return was on the proper basis. [P 145 C 2; P 146 C 1]

(b) Income-tax Act (1922), Ss. 34 and 59—Rules under S. 59, R. 25 – Income-tax Officer cannot depart from provisions of R. 25 and reopen assessment under S. 34.

Rule 25 is of a mandatory character and provides the only manner in which the income, profits and gains of life assurance companies can be ascertained and it is not open to an Income-tax Officer to depart from its provisions and to reopen assessment under S. 34 : A I R 1931 Lah 441, Approved. [P 146 C 1]

M. Patanjali Sastri — for I. T. Commr.

N. Rama Rao — for Assessee.

Leach C. J.—The assessee in this case is a life insurance company carrying on business at Masulipatam, having been incorporated in the year 1925. Under the provisions of S. 8, Life Assurance Companies Act, 1912, a life assurance company is required once in every five years, or at such shorter intervals as may be prescribed by the instrument constituting the company, or by its regulations or by laws, to cause an investigation to be made by an actuary into its financial condition, including a valuation of its liabilities. This company decided that the valuation should take place every four years. The first valuation was made in December 1930 and was for the period ended 31st December 1929. The next valuation took place in December 1934 and this was for the four years ended 31st December 1933. Under S. 22, Income-tax Act, the principal officer of every company shall prepare and on or before 15th June in each year, furnish to the Income-tax Officer a return in the prescribed form and verified in the prescribed manner of the total income of the company during the previous year. On 30th June 1934, the secretary of the company furnished the return contemplated by this section. It was 15 days late, but the Income-tax Officer accepted it and assessed the company to income-tax on the basis of the return. R. 25 of the Income-tax Rules provides that in the case of life assurance companies incorporated in British India, whose profits are periodically ascertained by actuarial valuation, the income, profits and gains of the life assurance business shall be the average annual net profits disclosed by the last preceding valuation. This Rule was framed under the provisions of S. 59 of the Act and has effect as if enacted in the Act.

The return which the secretary furnished to the Income-tax Officer on 30th June 1934 was based on the valuation for the period ended 31st December 1929 and on this basis the income of the company for the account year 1933 was Rs. 8294. The company paid the amount of the tax; but when the valuation for the four years ended 31st December 1933 was published in December 1934 it was found that the profits had greatly increased. If the assessment had been based on this return, the amount of the income would have been Rs. 39,755 instead of Rs 8294. When this was discovered by the Income-tax Officer, he issued a notice under S. 34 of the Act intimating his intention to assess the company in respect of the year 1933 on the further sum of Rupees 31,461 (the difference between Rs 39,755 and Rs. 8294) on the ground that this was income which had escaped assessment. The company objected and asked the Commissioner of Income-tax to refer the matter to this Court under the provisions of S. 66 (2). The Commissioner has accordingly referred the following question :

Whether the 'last preceding valuation' of the surplus of the company for the purposes of the assessment to be made for the year of assessment 1934-35 was in the circumstances of the case that covering the years 1926-29 or that covering the years 1930-33 ?

The Income-tax Commissioner in his reference has expressed the opinion that the Income-tax Officer is entitled to re-open the assessment under S. 34, notwithstanding the wording of R. 25. He contends that the expression 'the last preceding valuation' must be taken to mean the valuation covering the last valuation period terminating before 1st April of the year of assessment. This contention ignores the wording of R. 25. The wording is perfectly clear, and says that the income of a life assurance company shall be the average annual net profits disclosed by the last preceding valuation, that is the last preceding valuation at the time of the return. The return must be made by 15th June after the end of the year of account, unless the Income-tax Officer extends the time at the instance of the assessee. In this case the last preceding valuation when the return was submitted was the valuation made in December 1930 for the period ended 31st December 1929. As I have said, the words of the Rule are perfectly clear and they must be given their plain meaning. Giving them their plain meaning, the return made in June 1934 was made on the proper basis.

In these circumstances the Income-tax authorities had no right to serve a notice under S. 34 of the Act, as no income had escaped assessment. The return had been made in accordance with the statute and the tax had been paid. In 12 Lah 757[1] it was pointed out that R. 25 is of a mandatory character and provides the only manner in which the income, profits and gains of life assurance companies can be ascertained and that it is not open to an Income-tax Officer to depart from its provisions. With this opinion we are in entire agreement. It follows that the answer to the reference is that the last preceding valuation of the surplus of the company for the purposes of the assessment for the year 1934-35 was that covering the years 1926-29. As the company has succeeded, it will be entitled to its costs which we fix at Rs. 250.

Judgment.—Plaintiff is the appellant. The defendant, holding a power of attorney from his sister Muthathal, executed in favour of the plaintiff an agreement to give an othi in respect of his sister's property, in consideration of Rs. 240 received by him (defendant) on the date of the agreement. The defendant not having executed the othi, the plaintiff brought a suit for specific performance against the defendant, or, in the alternative, for the recovery of the money paid by him to the defendant. It is not now disputed that the defendant received the money. Both the Courts held that the suit for specific performance will not lie. The only question for decision in the second appeal is, whether the defendant is personally liable to pay the money received by him. On this point the first Court held that he was personally liable, but this decision was reversed by the Appellate Court. In the second appeal it is argued that the lower Court's decision is wrong and that it should be held that the defendant is personally liable and should repay the money received by him. The contract between the parties is contained in Ex. A. The relevant portion of it is as follows :

> Varthamanam letter executed . . . . in favour of Mookkan Servai . . . . by M. Muthaya Servai, the authorized agent and elder brother of Muthathal, daughter of Muthuswami Servai . . . .

After describing the terms and the land, Muthaya Servai signs it thus :

> M. Muthaya Servai, in his own handwriting.

The question is purely one of law and there are very many decisions bearing on the point. All of them were brought to my notice; but in this judgment I propose to examine only a few of them which I consider very important. The principle to be applied seems to be clear. Where a person signs a contract in his own name without any qualification, he is prima facie to be deemed to be contracting personally; and in order to prevent the liability from attaching to himself, it must appear from the document that he did not intend to bind himself as principal. In this case the defendant has put his signature to Ex. A, without any qualification; prima facie, therefore, he is personally liable. It is argued on behalf of the appellant that there is nothing in the body of the document to detract from the personal liability arising from the fact that the defendant has signed the document without any qualification. It is said that the description 'authorised agent' appearing in para. 1 is only descriptive of the position of the defendant and does not show that he makes the contract as the agent of Muthathal. One of the two important cases relied on in support of this contention was (1825) 28 R R 797.[1] In that case a man describing himself as agent went on to agree to lease a property in his own name. It was held that he was personally liable. In (1870) 5 Ex 173,[2] the contract was signed 'Walker and Strange' without any qualification. In the body of the document the words 'as agents for John Schemidt & Co., of Danzig' appeared. It was held that the defendants were personally liable upon the contract and that the words 'as agents for John Schemidt & Co.,' did not relieve the defendants from their personal liability. These two decisions clearly support the contention of the appellant. Other cases relied on by him were 119 E R 217,[3] 119 E R 1497,[4] (1871) 6 Q B 361,[5] (1879) 4 Ex D 104[6] and (1884) 13 Q B D 861.[7]

The respondents' learned counsel argues that the decision in (1870) 5 Ex 173[2] must be considered to have been practically overruled by the decision in (1876) 1 Ex D 357[8] and that this decision is a surer guide than any of the decisions cited by the appellant's counsel in deciding cases of this description. In (1876) 1 Ex D 357,[8] the signature in the document was without any qualification, but in the body of the document it appeared that the sale was 'on account of James Morand & Co.' It was held that this put the matter beyond any doubt and that the brokers who signed the document were not personally liable upon the contract. The decision in (1870) 5 Ex 173,[2] was commented upon and distinguished in this decision. In (1879) 4 Ex D 104,[6] Pollock B. made the following remark about these two decisions :

> In (1870) 5 Ex 173,[2] the words 'as agents for' a named foreign principal were held to be a mere description of the defendants, and not to free them from liability. In (1876) 1 Ex D 357,[8] which was tried before me at Liverpool, the words were 'on account of' a foreign principal. In that case I held that the defendants were not liable and this judgment, though overruled by the Exchequer Division, was upheld in the Court of Appeal. James L. J. based his decision on the difference between the expressions 'as agents for' and 'on account of', a distinction I confess I cannot appreciate, but which leaves (1870) 5 Ex 173,[2] an authority binding on me here . . .

The learned counsel for the respondent argues that the decision in (1876) 1 Ex D 357,[8] must be understood as overruling the decision in (1870) 5 Ex 173,[2] and that the words 'authorized agent' appearing in Ex. A in the present case exclude the personal liability of the defendant imported by the signature without any qualification. In (1923) A C 492,[9] their Lordships of the House of Lords seem to uphold the correctness of the decision in (1876) 1 Ex D 357[8]. Lord Parmoor says :

> The authorities have not been consistent but I agree that (1876) 1 Ex D 357[8] should be followed.

The case before the House of Lords was a clear one as the agent in that case had excluded his personal liability by adding the words 'as agent' to the signature itself. In our own Court, in 27 Mad 315[10] at p. 325, Benson and Bhashyam Ayyangar JJ. pointed out that the decision in (1870) 5 Ex 173[2] has been practically overruled by the decision in (1876) 1 Ex D 357.[8] They state thus :

> But the defendants in the present case having signed as 'managing agents' they cannot be held personally liable even according to that decision, (1870) 5 Ex 173,[2] which has however been practically overruled by the decision in (1876) 1 Ex D 357.[8]

On the strength of the decision in (1876) 1 Ex D 357,[8] the learned counsel for the respondents says that the description 'authorized agent of Muthathal' should be understood to exclude the personal liability of Muthayya Servai. The learned counsel also referred to the following decisions of the Indian Courts in the course of his arguments : 5 Cal 71,[11] 5 Bom 584,[12] A I R 1928 Cal 123[13] and A I R 1930 Bom 569.[14] It is not necessary to discuss them. How is the contract Ex. A to be interpreted in the light of the above decisions ? There is no doubt, as I said at the beginning, about the principle that should be applied. The question is what was the real intention of the parties ? Is the personal liability imported by the mere signature without any qualification intended to be excluded by the terms of the document ? If I follow the decision in (1876) 1 Ex D 357,[8] in preference to (1870) 5 Ex 173,[2] as I think I should, then the description 'authorized agent of Muthathal' should be held to exclude the personal liability of the defendant. There are other circumstances also appearing in the document to support the view that the parties did not intend to bind the defendant personally. These circumstances are mentioned in para. 8 of the appellate judgment :

> The defendant admittedly had no right to the land. The contract itself describes the property as belonging to the sister. The consideration was required to be applied for payment towards a decree which directed the sister to make it. This also is found expressly stated in the agreement. In the plaint it is distinctly alleged, without any equivocation, that the defendant as the agent of his sister contracted to mortgage the sister's land to the plaintiff : vide para. 3 . . . Unless the defendant executed the othi on behalf of his sister and as her agent, the plaintiff could derive no right to the enjoyment of the property.

I think the statement in the plaint explains what the plaintiff himself thought about the liability of the defendant. It is true that the defendant describes himself as the authorized agent and also the elder brother of Muthathal. I agree with the learned Judge in holding that the description 'elder brother' > does not appear to militate against the view that in agreeing to give a mortgage of his sister's property for money which he received for the purpose of paying for a decree under which the sister had to pay money, he acted only as the agent of that sister and not in his personal capacity.

In view of the decision in (1876) 1 Ex D 357[8] and the circumstances of the case, which I cannot overlook in interpreting the document on this point, I agree with the decision of the lower Court that the defendant is not personally liable on the contract Ex. A. The second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

O. P. No. 173 of 1936, Decided on 22nd October 1937.

* (a) Income-tax — Company formed to enable members to save money and to enable members to secure loans — Loans granted to nominal members — Nominal members not allowed to share in profits of company — Company held not mutual benefit society and its income held taxable.

A company was formed to enable its members to save money and to enable the members to secure loans at a favourable rate of interest on sufficient securities. Persons who wanted loans could obtain them from the company by becoming nominal members by paying one rupee which could be withdrawn after two years. Thus these nominal members, who had taken one rupee shares, invested practically nothing. By borrowing from the company they made for the company large profits in which they were not allowed to share. Besides this the company obtained considerable income from loans to non-members :

Held that in these circumstances the company could not be said to be mutual benefit society and hence its income was taxable : (1897) 2 Q B 402, Ref.; A I R 1923 Mad 684 (F B), Disting.

(b) Income-tax Act (1922), S. 10 (2) (iii) — Dividends paid by company to its members are not interest on borrowed capital.

Where a company did not pay interest to share-holders or subscribers on the capital subscribed by them but paid dividends to the members, the sums so paid are not in the nature of interest on borrowed capital, which is allowable under S. 10 (2) (iii). The company is therefore not entitled to claim a deduction in respect of these sums. [P 151 C 1]

(c) Income-tax—Res judicata — Doctrine of res judicata is inapplicable to assessment made by Income-tax Officer.

The doctrine of res judicata does not operate in respect of an assessment made by an Income-tax Officer. The Income-tax Officer does not constitute a Court, and therefore the doctrine can have no application. His assessments are final, unless they can be re-opened under some provision of the Income-tax Act. [P 151 C 1, 2]

Leach C. J.—The real question involved in this reference is whether the Trichinopoly Tennore Hindu Permanent Fund Ltd., a company registered under the Indian Companies Act, is a banking concern or a mutual benefit society. The question was raised on a former occasion, namely in respect of the income-tax year 1925-26. The income-tax authorities then treated the company as an ordinary banking concern and taxed it on that basis. At the instance of the company, the question was referred by the Commissioner of Income-tax to this Court which decided that the income-tax authorities had taken the correct view: 2 I T C 386.[1] After this decision had been given, the company took steps to alter its memorandum and articles of association. In the original memorandum the objects of the company were stated to be

(a) To enable persons to save money ; (b) to enable persons to secure loans at favourable rates of interest on sufficient securities and (c) to do all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects.

For the word 'persons' the word 'members' was substituted. The company had made considerable profits out of lending money to non-members and this was the reason for the decision that the company was a banking concern and not a mutual benefit society. The nominal capital was originally Rs. 2,99,970 made up as follows: (1) 1800 fully paid-up permanent shares of Rs. 50 each amounting to Rs. 90,000 ; (2) 2333 term shares of Rs. 90 each payable in 45 monthly instalments of Rs. 2 amounting to Rs. 2,09,970. After the alteration of the memorandum and the articles of association, the nominal capital of the company was Rs. 9,90,000 divided into seven classes of shares, namely :

(a) 1800 fully paid up 'Permanent' shares of Rs. 50 each, amounting to ...	...	Rs. 90,000
(b) 2120 'Original' term shares of Rs. 90, each payable in 45 consecutive monthly calls of Rs. 2, amounting to	...	Rs. 1,90,800
(c) 400 'A' class term shares of Rs. 93, each payable in 31 consecutive monthly calls of Rs. 3, amounting to	...	Rs. 37,200
(d) 2880 'B' class term shares of Rs. 90, each payable in 45 consecutive monthly calls of Rs. 2, amounting to	...	Rs. 2,59,000
(e) 4600 'C' class term shares of Rs. 83, each payable in 83 consecutive monthly calls of Re. 1, amounting to	...	Rs. 3,81,800
(f) 500 'Reserve' shares of Rs. 50, each payable in 10 calls of Rs. 5 each, Rs. 5 on application and the remaining calls whenever required on not less than one month's notice, amounting to ...	...	Rs. 25,000 and
(g) 6000 'Ordinary' shares of Re. 1, each fully paid up amounting to	...	Rs. 6,000
		Rs. 9,90,000

A person who required a loan had under the altered articles to become a member, but he could become a member on payment of one rupee, which he was entitled to withdraw at the end of two years. In passing, I should mention that it is conceded that the ordinary shares have been issued to persons who under the former scheme would have been non-member borrowers. After the memorandum and the articles had been altered, the company contended that it was in fact a mutual benefit society, and therefore its income was not taxable. The contention was accepted for the years 1928-29, 1929-30 and 1930-31 but in respect of the 1931-32 assessment, the income-tax authorities reconsidered the question and came to the conclusion that the company was in reality still a banking concern. In accordance with this decision, they re-opened the assessment for the year 1930-31. In respect of the year 1930-31 Income-tax Officer assessed the company on an income of Rs. 24,458 which was subsequently enhanced to Rs. 24,995. Thereupon the company asked the Commissioner of Income-tax to state a case to this Court under the provisions of S. 66 of the Act, but the Commissioner declined to do so. An application was then made under S. 66 (3) of the Act to this Court and the Commissioner was directed to state a case on the following questions :

1. Trichinopoly Tennore Hindu Permanent Fund Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1927) 14 A I R Mad 1078 = 107 I C 291=53 M L J 881=2 I T C 386 (S B).

(i) Whether the assessment of the petitioner to income-tax upon a sum of Rs. 24,995 for the year 1930-31 is valid and maintainable? (ii) Whether the present case is not governed by the decision in 47 Mad 1[2] and whether the petitioner is not therefore liable to pay income-tax? (iii) Whether the petitioner is not entitled to claim in computing the assessable income a deduction of the amount paid to the share-holders and subscribers in excess of their contribution as being interest on borrowed capital within S. 10 (2) (iii) of the Act? (iv) Whether the income-tax authorities are precluded in law from levying income-tax on the petitioner, having regard to the fact that the petitioner was recognized and treated by them as mutual benefit society and exempted from payment of income-tax since the year 1927? (v) Whether the assessment of the petitioner for the year 1930-31 under S. 34 of the Act is valid and maintainable?

It will be convenient to take questions (i) and (ii) together. The case referred to in 47 Mad 1 is that of Board of Revenue v. Mylapore Hindu Permanent Fund Ltd.[2] There the capital of the society was made up solely of periodical investments by its members and the income of the society was mainly derived from interest on loans given to its members, every one of whom was by the rules eligible to take loans. It was held that such income did not constitute "profits" within the meaning of the Income-tax Act, 1918. The Trichinopoly Tennore Hindu Permanent Fund Ltd. however, differs in material respects from the Mylapore Hindu Permanent Fund Ltd. In the case of the Trichinopoly Tennore Hindu Permanent Fund Ltd. the company obtained, as I have already mentioned, considerable income from loans to non-members. No doubt it now only gives loans to persons who become "members", but it is said that the membership is in many cases merely nominal and that the company carries on in reality the same business as it did before the memorandum and the articles of association were altered. It appears to us that there is much substance in this contention.

A person who wants a loan can obtain one from this company, if he pays one rupee for a share, and he is entitled to have that one rupee paid back to him at the end of two years. Out of a gross income of Rs. 33,954-7-8 for the nine months ended 31st March 1930, a sum of Rupees 14,217-13-9 represented interest on loans granted to persons who had each acquired an ordinary share of one rupee and only Rs. 139-11-4 was paid to these persons by way of dividend. The holders of permanent shares received in dividends Rs. 6542-2-6, the holders of original term shares Rupees 5550-9-5, the holders of "B" class term shares Rs. 3660-5-9, and the holders of "C" class term shares Rs. 3338-9-5. In other words, the large profits which the company made were distributed to its real share-holders. The nominal members, those who had taken one rupee shares, invested practically nothing and consequently nothing was paid to them out of the profits either by way of dividend or in reduction of interest. By borrowing from the company, they made for the company large profits, in which they were not allowed to share. In the circumstances, it is impossible for the company to contend that it is a mutual benefit society and its income is not taxable.

A very similar question to the one which arises here was dealt with in the case in (1897) 2 Q B 402.[3] This society consisted of members who held one or more shares or one or more fifth parts of a share and the shares were divided into two classes : (i) investors' shares and (ii) borrowers' shares. The members were divided into classes according to the shares they held. The society lent money to its members at a fixed rate of interest. The re-payment of the loans was by weekly payments of a fixed sum, which covered both principal and interest. No deduction was allowed by the income-tax authorities to be made by the borrower in respect of income-tax and the society was assessed on the interest it received as being interest of money within S. 2, Income-tax Act, 1853. On a case being stated, it was held that the expression "interest of money" in S. 2 of that Act was not restricted to annual interest and that the interest received by the society was not in respect of a loan on land, but of a contract relating to the interest of money lent, and was, therefore, assessable in their hands to income-tax. In the case before us, likewise, borrowers become members, but the holders of ordinary shares are members in name only. Their membership does not in any sense give them the benefits of membership of a mutual benefit society. Therefore, we consider that the answer to question (i) should be in the affirmative and the answer to question (ii) should be that it is not governed by the Mylapore Fund case.[2]

The answer to question (iii) has been correctly stated by the Commissioner of Income-tax in his reference. He points out that there is no payment of interest to share-holders or subscribers on the capital subscribed by them. The company pays dividends to its members and these are dependent on the earning of profits. The sums so paid are not in the nature of interest on borrowed capital, which is allowable under S. 10 (2) (iii) of the Act. The company is, therefore, not entitled to claim a deduction in respect of these sums. Questions (iv) and (v) can also be taken together. What is really contended for here is that the doctrine of res judicata operates in respect of an assessment made by an Income-tax Officer. This is clearly erroneous. The Income-tax Officer does not constitute a Court, and therefore the doctrine can have no application. But his assessments are final, unless they can be re-opened under some provision of the Act. Consequently the answer to question (iv) is in the negative and the answer to question (v) is in the affirmative. As the reference has been answered in favour of the Commissioner of Income-tax, he will be entitled to costs which we fix at Rs. 250.

Judgment. — The plaintiff became a partner in the firm of the defendants and in course of time the number of partners increased until, at the time of bringing the suit in 1924, the number of partners was

96. The partnership then became converted into a joint stock company. The plaintiff, though one of the partners, was not allotted any shares in the newly formed company. He therefore brought a suit for a declaration that there had been a dissolution of the partnership, for the taking of accounts, and for recovery of his share capital and his share of the profits with interest thereon. The trial Court went into all the matters raised very fully and decided against the plaintiff. In appeal, the lower Appellate Court decided against the plaintiff on two technical grounds, without considering the allegations made by the plaintiff. It found that as the number of partners was more than 20, no suit could be filed and secondly, that in any event the suit could not be maintained as all the partners had not been brought on record. The plaintiff appeals and contends that both the findings of the lower Appellate Court are wrong. If, as the plaintiff alleges, he was nothing more than the manager of the restaurant kitchen and one who had contributed Rs. 1000 to the business to become a partner, and that thereafter he had no knowledge of what took place and was unaware of the fact that the number of partners had increased beyond 20, then clearly the plaintiff should not be without a remedy of some sort. As was said in (1926) Ch 657,[1] where two persons, as secretary and treasurer, collected sums of money from various persons to form a club and the members themselves had no knowledge of what the secretary and treasurer had done, the law is not so powerless that when the money is in the hands of persons who have received it for application for an illegal purpose, it cannot protect the contributors or enable them to recover it before it has been applied for this illegal purpose.

If the plaintiff was entitled to a share of the profits of the firm when the membership was below 20, surely he was not to lose that right because the number of partners had increased beyond 20 without his knowledge. The appeal however has to be dismissed on the other ground, i. e. that the plaintiff should have impleaded all the partners as defendants. It may be true that at the time of filing the suit he was not aware of the number of partners; but he could readily have ascertained that because an objection to the maintainability of the suit on the ground of non-joinder was taken in the written statement itself. The learned advocate for the appellant has cited certain cases as instances where it was not thought necessary to implead every member of the partnership or firm. According to certain provisions of English Company law, the managing director or some other director is authorized to bring suits on behalf of the company and the question arose in (1828) 38 E R 917,[2] whether a suit brought by three share-holders purporting to sue on behalf of the general body of share-holders was maintainable against the directors, who were accused of misusing the share-holders' money. It was held that the nature of the case precluded the possibility of the directors joining in the suit as plaintiffs and that as the directors, who were ordinarily empowered to bring a suit, were themselves the defendants, they could not represent in a suit of that nature the general body of share-holders. Another case relied on by the appellant is (1876) 2 Ch D 763,[3] which was a suit for dissolution of a partnership where the membership was very large. A meeting was held in which a large majority of members of all classes were in favour of dissolution, and a suit was brought by representatives of all classes. It was held that some representatives of all classes could bring a suit on behalf of the general body of members. A third case is (1865) 1 Q B 77.[4] That was an ordinary representative suit in which a provision similar to O. 1, R. 8, Civil P. C., was invoked. In 53 Bom 652[5] a creditor brought a suit against certain prominent members of the company who had induced him to trade with the company. It was held that the suit was maintainable against the defendants because the liability of all the defendants was joint, as well as several, and that those defendants who were responsible for the creditors dealing with the company were liable. Similarly in 47 M L J 871[6] it was held that it was not necessary to implead all the partners in appeal because the liability of the defendants was joint as well as several. The liability in the present case is the liability of the individual partners and of the partnership and not jointly of the various members constituting the partnership. No suit is therefore maintainable without impleading all the partners and the lower Appellate Court was right in dismissing the appeal on this ground.

As soon as the written statement was filed, the plaintiff was aware of the existence of other partners and could have impleaded them. Instead of doing this, he obstinately contested the suit on this issue and so was prepared to have the suit dismissed on this technical ground. Even in the Appellate Court, he made no attempt to amend the plaint. Nor has he made such a request in this Court. The plaintiff has only to thank himself for having this suit dismissed on this technical ground. The appeal is therefore dismissed with costs. Leave to appeal is refused.

Order. — This is a civil revision petition against an order of the Principal Subordinate Judge of Trichinopoly dispaupering the plaintiff, under O. 33, R. 9, Civil P. C., on the ground of his having entered into an agreement with one Manickam Pillai with reference to the subject matter of the suit. The execution of the agreement was admitted, but it was alleged that the agreement was neither in respect of the subject matter of the suit, nor had any person obtained an interest in such subject matter. After the agreement was produced by Manickam Pillai, the plaintiff alleged subsequently that the agreement was altered in material particulars after its execution, and that he did not know of such alteration until it was produced in Court. After recording evidence in the proceedings, the learned Subordinate Judge found it as a fact that the agreement was not altered. The petitioner now asked me to interfere with this finding on the ground that it is erroneous. After hearing his counsel's arguments, who led me through the evidence, I find myself in agreement with the finding of the Court below. Even if I had not arrived at the same conclusion, I would not have been entitled to interfere with it. The lower Court was entitled to come to a finding, and having determined the question of fact against the petitioner, it cannot be said to have acted either illegally or with any material irregularity. It is thus clear that this ground is neither correct nor open to the petitioner in revision.

It was then contended on behalf of the petitioner that even if the agreement was accepted as genuine, it did not create any right in the subject matter of the suit. A reference was made by his counsel to S. 54, T. P. Act, and S. 17, Registration Act, which was in my opinion wholly irrelevant in this case. Under the terms of the present agreement, Manickam Pillai had advanced a sum of Rs. 500 to the petitioner towards the expenses already incurred by him in conducting the suit till then and had also agreed to advance another sum of Rs. 500 "for taking steps and for the expenses that may be necessary hereafter till the disposal of the suit in the Sub-Court, Trichinopoly." The petitioner had in consideration of the advances so made, and promised to be made subsequently, agreed to repay the amount of Rs. 1000 with interest within three months of the disposal of the suit. He had further undertaken to sell one-fourth share of the properties to which he might be held entitled if he failed to repay the money due from him within the time mentioned above.

An agreement of this nature does fall in my opinion within the language of O. 33, R. 9 (c) which is wide enough to cover such an interest as was created by the petitioner in Manickam Pillai's favour. Moreover, as observed by Mullick J in 50 I C 520,[1] the provisions contained in O. 33, Civil P. C., were designed in aid of bona fide litigants and must be strictly confined to them. With this observation of the learned Judge I respectfully agree. I would therefore reject the petition for revision with costs. The petitioner's counsel asked me in the end that if his petition was not to be accepted, I might grant him further time to pay the necessary court-fees. The Court has power to do so under S. 149, Civil P. C., and in view of the fact that the lower Court had also granted him a month to pay the requisite court-fees of which he could not avail himself on account of this petition having been filed and admitted, I would accede to this request and order the petitioner to pay the necessary court-fee within a fortnight from this date.

Appeal No. 47 of 1937, Decided on 28th September 1937, from judgment of Gentle J., D/- 28th April 1937.

(a) Companies Act (1913), S. 235 — Promoter—Person not taking any steps to bring company into being, but merely signing memorandum of association and subscribing for certain shares — Fact that money so subscribed had been utilized in paying part of expenses of formation does not make him promoter.

Section 235 only applies to a person who has taken part in the formation or promotion of the company, to a past or present director, manager or liquidator or to an officer of the company. [P 155 C 2]

There was no evidence showing that a person took any part in discussing the formation of the company or in taking any steps to bring the company into being apart from the fact that he signed the memorandum of association and paid for certain shares and the money subscribed by him for his shares was utilised in defraying part of the expenses of forming the company :

Held that the application of the money which he paid for his shares was a matter over which he had no control, and the fact that the money was utilised in paying the expenses of formation could not make him a promoter. [P 156 C 1,2]

 (b) Companies Act (1913), S. 235—Share broker of company is not officer for purpose of S. 235.

There is no difference in the position of a broker to a company whose duties are confined to dealing with the shares of the company and the position of the banker who has to deal with the moneys of the company. A broker has nothing to do with the management of the company, and may have no knowledge of what is being done inside company's office. Therefore, to classify him as an officer of the company, within the meaning of S. 235 would be putting too great a strain on the wording of the section. If moneys had been wrongly paid to the brokers, the Official Liquidator has, subject to the law of limitation, other means of recovering them, but he is not entitled to use S. 235 for the purpose. T. D. Srinivasachariar — for Respondents.

Leach C. J.—This appeal arises out of a misfeasance summons taken out by the Official Liquidator of the National Live Stock Registration Bank Ltd. against the respondents who were the brokers of the company. The company was registered on 2nd July 1927 with a nominal capital of Rs. 5,00,000 divided into 50,000 shares of Rs. 10 each, of which 40,500 were preferred and 9500 ordinary shares. The certificate permitting the company to carry on the business was issued by the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies on 1st August 1927. The company was unsuccessful in its operations and went into voluntary liquidation on 11th December 1930. The voluntary liquidation was turned into a compulsory liquidation by order of this Court, dated 13th October 1932. The Official Liquidator sought to make the respondents liable to repay a sum of Rupees 8865.11.3, which they had received as share brokers of the company. The respondents are partners of a firm of provision dealers carrying on business under the name of A. T. Velu Mudaliar & Company. They had no previous experience as share brokers and it is obvious that they owed their appointment to their relationship to V. K. Lakshmana Mudaliar one of the promoters of the company, who is the son of the second respondent and the brother-in-law of the first respondent. A draft of the agreement under which the respondents were to act as brokers of the company was drawn up in the month of May 1927 and although the company had not then been registered, it was signed on 31st May 1927. Under it, the respondents were to receive a very high commission, Re. 1-8-0, for every share of the company sold through them, and eight-annas in respect of every share sold through other agencies. Article 9 of the articles of association which came into force at a later date stated that the respondents' firm should be the sole selling brokers of the company and under it they were to receive a commission of five per cent. on the amount subscribed, but the document of 31st May 1927 purported to fix the commission at 15 per cent. After the formation of the company, the matter was discussed by the directors and on 22nd October 1927, they passed a resolution agreeing to ratify the arrangement, subject to an alteration which amounted to very little. The respondents accepted the modification and were paid on the basis of the modified agreement notwithstanding that the directors had exceeded their powers in ratifying it. The appeal is not, however, concerned with the liability of the directors in this respect.

The amount paid to the respondents was, as I have already indicated, the sum of Rs. 8865-11-3, which the Official Liquidator desired to recover from them on the ground that the agreement was ultra vires. Accordingly he took out a summons under S. 235, Companies Act 1913, and the matter in due course came before Stone J. who referred the question of what was due under the agreement to the Official Referee. After holding an inquiry, the Official Referee reported that the respondents were not entitled to retain the Rs. 8865-11-3. The Official Referee's report came before Gentle J. when it was contended on behalf of the respondents that all remedy against the respondents had become time-barred. It was said that the Article which applied to the case was Art. 36, Limitation Act, which allows only a period of two years. The Official Liquidator urged that the Article which applied was Art. 120, which allows a period of six years. The learned Judge found that Art. 36 applied and this appeal has been filed to challenge the finding. The Court is however not called upon to decide the question as it is manifest that for other reasons, the Official Liquidator is not entitled to ask for an order against the respondents under S. 235, Companies Act 1913. That section only applies to a person who has taken part in the formation or promotion of the company, to a past or present director, manager or liquidator or to an officer of the company. Neither respondent was ever a director, manager or liquidator of the company, and for reasons which I shall indicate, I do not think that either can be deemed to be a promoter or officer. As a matter of fact, so far as respondent 2 is concerned, the Court is not asked to hold that he was a promoter.

I will first discuss the question whether respondent 1 can be deemed to be a promoter. In (1877) 2 C P D 469,[1] Cookburn C. J. defined the word "promoter" as being one who undertakes to form a company with reference to a given project and to set it going and to take the necessary steps to accomplish that purpose. Other definitions have been given by the learned Judges from time to time, but it is impossible to define accurately what is meant by the word "promoter". The difficulty is discussed at length by the learned author of Palmer's Company Precedents at pp. 103 to 109. After referring to a number of the more prominent cases, the learned author observes at p. 106:

> It is obvious therefore that a person who originates the scheme for the formation of the company, has the memorandum and articles prepared, executed and registered, and finds the first directors, settles the terms (if any), and makes arrangements for advertising and circulating the prospectus and placing the capital, is emphatically a promoter in the fullest sense. He controls the formation and future of the company, and it is this control which lies at the root of the fiduciary relation of the promoter to the company. Nor is he the less a promoter if all or most of these activities are performed nominally by a company which he controls. But a person who has done much less than this—takes a much less prominent part—may bring himself within the meaning of the term and may be held liable as a promoter.

Each case must be decided according to the evidence. If it is clear that the persons charged were merely servants or agents of the promoters or servants or agents of the company, they cannot be classified as promoters, and in this connexion the learned author makes mention of brokers, bankers and solicitors. Of course, brokers, bankers and solicitors could put themselves in the position of being promoters, but in order to do so they would have to travel outside their ordinary spheres. Now, what are the facts here? As I have indicated, the question of promotion only applies to respondent 1. It is said that he must be deemed to have taken part in the formation of the company and to be a promoter, because he signed the memorandum and articles of association and subscribed for 100 shares. There is no evidence showing that he took any part in discussing the formation of the company or in taking any steps to bring the company into being, apart from the fact that he signed the memorandum of association and paid for 100 shares. It is not even suggested that he had anything to do with the drawing up of the memorandum and articles of association. There is no suggestion that respondent 1 had anything to do with the selection of the directors or the settlement of any contract, except the contract under which his firm was to act as brokers. After the company had been formed and had started business, respondent 1's firm induced certain people to subscribe for shares, but it is not alleged that they did anything before the company was launched. The minimum subscription was fixed at 500 shares and the signatories to the memorandum of association themselves subscribed for 1200 shares. In the memorandum of association the only persons referred to as promoters are V. K. Lakshmanan Mudaliar and J. W. Samuel. It comes to this. The Court is asked to hold respondent 1 to be a promoter because his signature appears at the foot of the memorandum and he took 100 shares of the 1200 initially subscribed.

This is a contention which I am unable to accept. The law requires that there shall be seven signatories to the memorandum of association of a public company. A person who has taken no part in the formation or promotion of the company may be asked to sign the memorandum as a subscriber for one or more shares, and this usually happens. It was mentioned in the course of the argument that the money subscribed by respondent 1 for his 100 shares was utilized in defraying part of the expenses of forming the company. That may be, but it was a matter which concerned the directors. The application of the money which respondent 1 paid for his shares was a matter over which he had no control, and the fact that the money was utilized in paying the expenses of formation cannot make him a promoter. The agreement with the respondents was an agreement which conscientious directors ought never to have entered into, and in doing so the directors deliberately exceeded their powers. But this, of course, has nothing to do with the question whether respondent 1 is to be deemed to be a person who took part in the formation and promotion of the company. For the reasons indicated, it must be held that the Official Liquidator was not entitled to take out a summons against respondent 1 on the ground that he was a promoter.

Can the respondents be deemed to be officers of the company? S. 2 of the Act defines the word "officer" as including "any director, manager or secretary, but, save in Ss. 235, 236 and 237, does not include an auditor." The definition is therefore not exhaustive. The inclusion of the auditor for the purposes of Ss. 235, 236 and 237 follows the course adopted in England and avoids the discussion which had taken place in the Courts there with regard to the position of the auditor. But it does not follow because the auditor is an officer for the purposes of S. 235, the company's share broker is in the same position. In (1894) 71 L T 406,[2] where the question was whether a person who was appointed to act as solicitor to the society was an officer of the society, Cave J. observed:

> It seems to me that merely because he was appointed solicitor to the society, without more, the solicitor does not become an officer of the society any more than it has been held that a banker does if he is appointed banker to the society, or a broker if he is appointed broker to the society, or the auditor if he is appointed auditor to the society. All these persons render services to the society, but they cannot be said to be in the employment of the society so as to make them officials.

I can see no difference in the position of a broker to a company whose duties are confined to dealing with the shares of the company and the position of the banker who has to deal with the moneys of the company. A broker has nothing to do with the management of the company and may have no knowledge of what is being done inside company's office. Therefore, to classify him as an officer of the company, within the meaning of S. 235 of the Act, would in my opinion be putting too great a strain on the wording of the section. If moneys had been wrongly paid to the brokers, the Official Liquidator had, subject to the law of limitation, other means of recovering them, but he is not entitled to use S. 235 for the purpose. For these reasons the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs which will be paid out of the assets of the company. The Official Liquidator will be allowed his costs out of the assets.

Madhavan Nair J.—I entirely agree and have nothing to add.

Appeal No. 182 of 1936, Decided on 22nd September 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Chingleput, in O. S. No. 37 of 1931.

 (a) Will—Executors appointed under will declining to accept office — Heir-at-law of testator can maintain action to recover possession of estate left by testator.

In India there is no distinction made between realty and personalty, and therefore the entire estate, both moveable and immovable property, left by the deceased must be deemed to vest in the heir-at-law until an administrator is duly constituted. A legatee does not represent the estate and he has no direct right of action against the person who is claiming adversely to the estate. Therefore to preserve and safeguard the estate, a right of action must vest in some body to prevent an adverse claim against the estate and the heir-at-law is the person in whom the law vests the estate whether he will or not even under Hindu law. Therefore where executors decline to accept office, there is nothing to preclude an heir-at-law to maintain an action in ejectment or otherwise recover possession of the estate left by testator. The heir-at-law, if he likes, can get himself appointed administrator but he is not bound to do so. It is open to legatees to have an administrator duly constituted. As soon as such an administrator is constituted, the estate would be divested from the heir-at-law and the person competent to maintain a suit on behalf of the estate will be such administrator: Case law discussed. [P 159 C 2; P 160 C 1]

Venkataramana Rao J.—This appeal raises a question of some importance. It relates to the rights of an heir-at-law with reference to an estate left by a testator where the executors appointed under his will decline to accept office. The facts necessary for the disposal of the exact point in controversy in the suit may be briefly stated. The plaintiff—respondent 1—Amaravathi Ammal was the widow of one Balasundara Mudali. He died on 9th February 1919, leaving him surviving his widow and his last will and testament dated 19th November 1918. In the said will, he said that he became divided in status from his brother—defendant 1—appellant 1 Sivasankara Mudali, that some properties were divided and as regards the other properties, he had been getting equally the income derived from them. He made several dispositions in the said will and among others bequeathed certain immovable properties and moneys to his widow Amaravathi. He also provided for certain charities and appointed one Ratna Mudali and Jagannatha Mudali as his executors. Subsequent to the execution of the said will, through the intervention of the mediators, some of the immovable properties of the family were divided and two lists were drawn up specifying separately the properties that fell to each and the two lists were signed by both the brothers. The date of the lists is 30th December 1918.

The case of the plaintiff is that in pursuance of the said division the said Balasundara Mudali was in possession and enjoyment of the said properties. Immediately after the death of Balasundara, appellant 1, Sivasankara Mudali, began to set up that his brother died undivided and disputed the possession of Balasundra with reference to the properties that fell to his share. Thereupon the plaintiff presented for registration the said two lists, but it was opposed by Sivasankara and this led to a litigation which lasted till 1931, and was finally disposed of by a judgment in a Letters Patent appeal dated 20th October 1931 in her favour. Before the close of this litigation, as 12 years from her husband's death were about to expire, she filed the present suit on 19th November 1930, for recovery of possession of the properties left by her husband. She recited the said will and the bequests in her favour and also the fact that the executors did not accept office. She therefore alleged that as heir and legatee, she is entitled to sue and recover the properties left by her husband for the purpose of carrying out all the directions in his will, and she also further stated that she was willing to carry out the charities in accordance therewith. She set out in the several schedules to the plaint the properties whereof she sought possession. In Sch. 1 she specified the immovable properties which fell to the share of Balasundara at the division of 30th December 1918. In Sch. 2 she specified the properties still to be divided between Balasundara and appellant 1 and claimed a half share therein. In Sch. 3 she specified the businesses wherein Balasundara and appellant 1 were partners and claimed half a share in the moneys and profits due therefrom. Appellant 2, defendant 2 in the suit, is the undivided son of appellant 1. Both of them denied the will and also pleaded that the deceased Balasundara died undivided and that the will left by him was inoperative. They further pleaded that the suit as laid was incompetent as she was neither the executrix nor the duly constituted administratrix under the law; that, if at all, she could only recover the properties specifically bequeathed to her under the will. They also raised the plea of limitation.

As already stated, the two executors Ratna Mudali and Jagannatha Mudali did not accept office and by the date of the suit Ratna Mudali was dead and Jagannatha, who was alive, was made defendant 3 in the suit. On 30th January 1935 before the trial began, he was transposed as plaintiff 2. The learned Subordinate Judge held that Balasundara died divided in status leaving a will, that the suit was competent and that she (plaintiff) could recover possession of the estate left by her husband and further any defect that there was in the original frame of the suit was cured by the transposition of Jagannatha as plaintiff 2. He held that so far as the immovable properties left by the testator were concerned, there was no question of limitation, but in regard to the claim for the profits of the businesses specified in Sch. 3, the suit was barred by limitation. He accordingly gave a decree for the immovable properties as claimed in Schs. 1 and 2 and also a specific sum of Rs. 500 which was claimed in Sch. 6 as being a certain sum of money deposited with a certain Nidhi, empowering her to draw that amount. This appeal has been preferred by defendants 1 and 2.

The main argument addressed by the learned counsel for the appellants, Mr. T. M. Krishnaswami Aiyar, related to the competency of the suit by the plaintiff, respondent 1. His contention is briefly this. Where the executors failed to accept office, in the absence of a duly constituted administrator, the plaintiff cannot recover possession of any properties left by the testator save those which were specifically bequeathed to her under the will and the decree in so far as it directed delivery of possession of properties other than those to which she was entitled is wrong. The question is, is the contention tenable? If this case were governed by English law, there can be no question that the suit would be competent so far as the immovable property is concerned. Before Lord Birkenhead's Act, where an executor dies or fails to accept office, the legal position was that so far as realty is concerned, it vested in the heir until a legal representative was duly constituted. As observed by Williams in his book on Real Property:

> An heir-at-law is the only person in whom the law of England vested property whether he would or not. As the estate cannot therefore remain in abeyance, 'where there is no executor, the estate descended to the heir pending the appointment of an administrator': Williams' Real Property, Edn. 24, pp. 101 and 102.

This position was made clear by Lord North in (1898) 2 Ch 573[1] where the learned Judge at p. 576 pointed out that until probate was taken, the estate remained > where the law makes the legal estate go when a man died intestate, i. e. in the heir-at-law."

In a later case, (1914) 2 Ch 547[2] at p. 552, Lord Cozens-Hardy M. R. observed:

1. John v. John, (1898) 2 Ch 573=67 L J Ch 616=79 L T 362=47 W R 52=14 T L R 583.
2. In re Griggs; Ex parte School Board for London, (1914) 2 Ch 547=111 L T 931=83 L J Ch 835=13 L G R 27=58 S J 796.

Until there is a personal representative, the property vests in the heir. He could recover the rents and maintain actions for trespass.

This statement of the law has been always accepted to be correct and has been recently affirmed by the Privy Council in (1937) A C 626[3] where Lord Blanesburgh at pp. 641 and 642 remarked thus:

Under S. 6 (of the New Zealand Act of 1879) the vesting of the real estate of a deceased person in the executor is, as will have been seen, to take effect immediately upon 'the granting of probate of the will or administration of the estate or an order to administer the estate' of the deceased. But not before. And in Victoria, under the Administration Act, 1872, of that State, No. 427, S 6 —a section admittedly indistinguishable from this S. 6 of the New Zealand Act of 1879—it was held as long ago as 1875 in (1875) 1 V L R (L) 164[4] at p. 166, that there was in that section nothing to destroy the status of the old heir-at-law between the death of the deceased and grant of administration to his estate, and an action of ejectment brought during that interval by the heir-at-law in respect of the property of the deceased was accordingly there sustained. The correctness of the principle enunciated in (1875) 1 V L R (L) 164[4] at p. 166 was not canvassed by the respondents here. Nor could it well have been; it is fundamental; it has been applied in England in analogous circumstances under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, when in (1914) 2 Ch 540[2] Lord Cozens Hardy M. R. observed: "Until there is a personal representative, the property vests in the heir."

The question is, is there anything to preclude the applicability of that doctrine in this country to a mofussal will such as the one now in question? Whatever may be the state of the Indian law, before the enactment of the Hindu Wills Act and Probate and Administration Act which were intended to embody the principles of English Jurisprudence, at any rate after the said enactments, there is nothing to preclude the applicability of the principles of English law. The principle that until an administrator is duly constituted an heir-at-law can recover the estate, has been applied by the Indian High Courts. In 46 Mad 190[5] at page 226 Kumaraswami Sastri J. observed thus:

In cases where probate is not necessary, there should be some indication that the person appointed executor is willing to accept office and perform the duties of the executor. In cases where he does not accept office, I think, the estate must vest in the legal representative until an application is made by some person competent to obtain a grant under the Probate and Administration Act.

It is an instructive case. A testatrix died leaving a will appointing an executor. On the date of the will the property which she left thereunder was the subject matter of a pending litigation wherein she was the plaintiff. The executor did not accept office. The heirs-at-law brought themselves on record as the legal representatives at the same time alleging that in case the will left by the testatrix was found to be true, they would deliver possession of the properties to the legatees just as the plaintiff in this case said that she would carry out the directions in the will. They continued the litigation and brought it to a successful termination and recovered the property which she disposed of under the will. After such recovery, the legatees under the will sued the heirs-at-law for recovery of possession of the estate and the suit was held to be in time. One of the arguments advanced by the heirs-at-law in that case was that inasmuch as there was a will they were not the legal representatives of the testatrix and the recovery by them could not be deemed to be on behalf of the legatees and it was the duty of the legatees to have themselves brought on the record or got a duly constituted administrator appointed to carry on the litigation and therefore they must be deemed to have been in possession of the estate adversely to the estate. It was in combating this argument Kumaraswami Sastri J. made the observations cited above and held that as the executor did not accept office, the heir-at-law was the proper person to come on the record and continue the litigation.

The same view was taken in the Calcutta High Court in 18 C W N 1136.[6] It was held in that case that it is competent to a legal heir to maintain a suit for the benefit of the estate so long as any other claimant does not establish his rights to the same under the will. This view has been again affirmed in a recent decision in 59 Cal 911,[7] where the legal heirs were held competent to maintain a suit on a mortgage in the name of the deceased testator until an administrator was duly constituted (p. 916). In this country there is no distinction made between realty and personalty and therefore the entire estate both moveable and immovable property left by the deceased must be deemed to vest in the heir-at-law until an administrator is duly constituted : vide 34 Mad 395.[8] A legatee does not represent the estate and he has no direct right of action against the person who is claiming adversely to the estate. Therefore to preserve and safeguard the estate, a right of action must vest in somebody to prevent an adverse claim against the estate and the heir-at-law is the person in whom the law vests the estate whether he will or not even under Hindu law. Therefore there is nothing to preclude an heir-at-law to maintain an action in ejectment or otherwise recover possession of the estate left by testator. The heir-at-law, if he likes, can get himself appointed administrator but he is not bound to do so. It is open to legatees to have an administrator duly constituted. As soon as such an administrator is constituted, the estate would be divested from the heir-at-law and the person competent to maintain a suit on behalf of the estate will be such administrator.

An argument has been advanced by Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer based on S. 17, Limitation Act. He contends that S. 17 uses the expression "legal representative" which must be deemed to connote an executor or an administrator and this is a clear indication of the intention of the Legistature that in cases where a testator dies leaving a will, the heir-at-law could not be the person in whom the law would vest the estate. It seems to us that S. 17 does not throw any light on the question in issue as it does not say who a "legal representative" within the meaning of the section is. Again the argument in our opinion proceeds upon a misconception of the true meaning of the expression "legal representative" in the section. There is no definition of the expression "legal representative" in the Limitation Act. According to the plain language of S. 17, legal representative would also include an heir. Legal representative is one who represents in law the estate of the deceased and in whom the legal personalty of the deceased is deemed to continue. He may be an heir, executor or administrator. Where a person died intestate, it cannot be said that the legal representative of the deceased in S. 17 would not include an heir and that no limitation would run if there was an heir capable of suing. Herein must be noted the distinction between English and Indian law. Under the English law,

> If the statute has not begun to run during the lifetime of an intestate, then it does not begin to run until letters of administration to his estate have been taken out : vide (1870) 5 Ch 238[9] at p. 241.

This is because the personalty did not vest in the next of kin under the early English law and later in the Court of Probate until an administrator is constituted, but under the Indian law the moveable property vests in the heir-at-law. All that S. 17 contemplates is that if there is no legal representative who is capable of suing, the statute of of limitation would not run. The heir-at-law may be a minor in which case limitation would not run by virtue of S. 6 but as soon as an administrator of the estate is constituted, limitation would begin to run against him and the fact that there is an heir-at-law who is a minor would not prevent the operation of the law of limitation. This position is made clear by S. 17, Clause 2, which deals with a suit against a legal representative of a deceased person. There is no qualification to the effect that he must be capable of being sued, because an heir-at-law whether a minor or not, an executor or administrator all of them are capable of being sued. That the expression "legal representative" is not intended to be confined to an executor or administrator seems to be clear from the decision in 20 Bom 15[10] which has been affirmed by the Privy Council in 23 Bom 544.[11] That was a case of dissolution of partnership. The suit was by the administrator of a deceased partner claiming the assets of partnership for recovery of amount due to him. The partner died in 1889 having dissolved the partnership. The suit was instituted in 1894. Prima facie, the suit would be barred by limitation under Art. 106, Limitation Act. It was contended that as the letters of administration were granted to the estate of the deceased partner and an administrator was duly constituted only in March 1894 under S. 17, Limitation Act, the time could only be deemed to have run from this date.

11. Bhagavandas v. Rivett Carnac, (1899) 23 Bom 544=26 I A 32 (P C).

Candy J. before whom the case came on for trial, took the view that though after the grant of the letters no person other than the administrator can act as the representative of the deceased partner, there was no reason why a person claiming to be the heir of the deceased partner should not have filed the suit and he therefore held that the suit was barred. In that case the heir-at-law was a minor; when the matter came up on appeal, the learned Judges who heard the appeal took the view that as the heir-at-law was a minor, there was no legal representative capable of suing until letters of administration were granted and therefore the suit must be deemed to be in time. They interpreted the words "capable of suing" as meaning not under a disability to sue and infancy would be such a disability. It is thus clear that the learned Judge would have upheld Candy J's decision if it were not for the fact that the heir-at-law was a minor. This view was affirmed by the Privy Council : vide 23 Bom 544[10] at p. 549. It seems to us therefore that the argument based on S. 17, Limitation Act, is not a tenable one.

We are therefore of the opinion that the suit by the plaintiff was competent. There is no other point of substance in the appeal and none has been pressed before us in the view we have taken of the competency of the suit. In the result, the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Varadachariar J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for the recovery of a sum of money. The plaint also claimed that the amount should be recovered by sale of the suit property on the footing of a charge on the property. Defendant 1, who was admittedly the owner of the property at one time, is the mother of defendants 2 and 3. It is common ground that in 1924 this property had been given as security to one Kuppu Rao. In 1926 a suit was instituted by Kuppu Rao for the recovery of the amount due to him. He died pending that suit and the Administrator-General who took charge of his estate continued the suit and obtained a decree. In execution of that decree, the property was advertised for sale on 25th January 1928. The documentary evidence in the case, read in the light of the oral evidence, establishes that some days before the sale, attempts were made by defendants 1 and 2 to raise money to pay off the mortgage decree and prevent the sale of the property. It is the plaintiff's case that his money was advanced for this purpose, through his cousin P. W. 6, and that the understanding, as evidenced by Ex. A, was that defendant 1 was to execute a hypothecation bond for the entire amount advanced by the plaintiff. As the defendants impeached the genuineness of Ex. A and of some of the other documents produced on the plaintiff's side, it will be convenient to refer in the first instance to documents which have not been impeached. It is sufficient at this stage to state that no mortgage was in fact executed; but the plaintiff claims a charge on the principle of subrogation as his money had been utilized to pay off the mortgage decree in favour of Kuppu Row's estate. The contesting defendants deny even the fact that plaintiff's moneys went to pay off that decree and they contend that the plaintiff is not entitled to invoke the principle of subrogation.

P. W. 6 was the proprietor of Dowden & Co., and there are in the record certain letters that passed between him and the Administrator-General, and as their genuineness has not been challenged their contents may be taken as fairly true; their truth has also been sworn to by P. W. 6. These letters make it clear that the money which was paid to satisfy Kuppu Rao's decree was paid to the Administrator-General by Dowden & Co., on behalf of the present plaintiff who was the cousin of P. W. 6. It is also significant that in one of them there is express reference to the intention to take necessary documents from the defendants before paying the balance due under the mortgage decree. A short time was obtained to make payment of the balance and the decree amount was finally discharged by a further deposit by Dowden & Co. made in the name of the plaintiff. Though the execution records relating to that mortgage suit were not exhibited in the lower Court, we have, with the consent of the advocates on both sides, inspected them here. They only show that the decree was reported satisfied and that the sale warrant was accordingly returned unexecuted. Barring a passing reference in one petition to a payment having been made by one Narasimha Rao on behalf of the defendants, there is nothing further in the records of that case to show that the decree was discharged by the present plaintiff or that there was any arrangement between the present plaintiff and the defendants in that suit in respect of their executing a security bond in favour of the plaintiff to secure repayment of the sum advanced by him. The admitted documents, taken with the evidence of P. Ws. 6 and 7 suffice, in our opinion, to show that the present version of defendants 1 and 3 that it is they who found the money to pay off Kuppu Rao's mortgage decree and that they had no transaction whatever with the plaintiff in that connexion cannot be true. It has not been suggested what motive P. W. 6 had in 1928 to make a reference to the present plaintiff as the person whose money was being paid to the Administrator-General in satisfaction of the mortgage decree unless the statement represented the truth. Nor is it easy to understand why there should be any reference to documents being taken from the defendants in that suit, if it was the defendants' money which was being paid in discharge of that decree.

If, as seems to follow from the above facts, it was plaintiff's money which was in fact paid to discharge Kuppu Rao's decree and there was an intention to take formal documents from the defendants in due course to secure repayment thereof, there is little force in the objection raised on behalf of the defendants to the genuineness of the letters, Exs. A, Y and Z on which the claim in the present suit is founded. These letters show that the money was lent on the express understanding that its repayment should be secured by a hypothecation bond to be executed by defendants 1 and 2. But as the parties hoped that they might sell the property privately and pay off the amount due to the plaintiff, there was considerable delay in the execution of the hypothecation bond. On a notice, Ex. J, being sent by an advocate on behalf of the plaintiff to the defendants, bringing these facts to their notice, Exs. Y and Z were executed by defendants 1 and 2, and in these documents they reiterated their promise to execute a formal mortgage deed within 15 days if by that time they were not able to pay up the money by the sale of the property. These documents are formally proved by persons who were present at their execution by defendants 1 and 2, and we see no reason to differ from the view of the learned trial Judge that they are genuine documents executed by defendants 1 and 2. If matters stood there, there can be little doubt that notwithstanding the non-execution of a formal mortgage deed, as originally contemplated by the parties, the plaintiff will be entitled to invoke the doctrine of subrogation. The case is clearly governed by the principle of the decision in 29 Cal 154,[1] and the mere fact that at the time when the money was lent by the plaintiff to P. W. 6, no deed of mortgage had really been executed or that the parties intended to secure repayment by a formal deed of mortgage will not affect the applicability of the rule of subrogation to the case : cf. (1910) 2 Ch 277.[2]

Towards the end of 1931 it unfortunately happened that defendants 1 and 2 fell out, and defendant 1 who seems to have been dissatisfied with the conduct of defendant 2, who had become an insolvent and had incurred considerable losses in business, thought fit to settle the suit property on defendant 3, her younger son. This was carried out by a deed of settlement dated 19th November 1931. The settlement deed makes no reference to the arrangement with the plaintiff, nor does it make any provision for payment of the money due to the plaintiff under Exs. A, Y and Z. Whether even at that time the mother and the younger son had the fraudulent intention of cheating the plaintiff out of his money it is not easy to say, though the attitude taken up by them during the trial of the suit in totally denying the plaintiff's claim makes one suspicious whether it was not their deliberate object to defeat the transaction which had been brought about by defendant 2. Anyhow, as defendant 3's claim is only under a deed of settlement, he cannot set up his title thereunder against the plaintiff's claim unless the defence that the plaintiff never paid any money or that plaintiff has at best only a personal claim and not a right to a charge on the suit property is made out. In the view we have already expressed both these defences fail and the plaintiff will undoubtedly be entitled to a decree in enforcement of a charge on the suit property against defendants 1 and 3.

The claim of defendant 4 has, as the learned trial Judge points out, given rise to greater difficulty. She claims to have lent money to defendant 3 in ignorance of plaintiff's rights and has obtained a mortgage over the suit property. The plaintiff's case is that the mortgage deed, Ex. 6, executed by defendant 3 in favour of defendant 4 on 23rd December 1931, is a sham transaction and does not represent any real loan. Alternatively the plaintiff has also suggested that defendant 4 must have had notice of the plaintiff's claim and can at best rank only as a puisne mortgagee. The learned trial Judge has accepted defendant 4's case to this extent that he has found that defendant 4 was an innocent mortgagee who has advanced money. But he postponed defendant 4's claim to that of the plaintiff on the ground that defendant 4 has been negligent in lending the money without calling for the title deeds relating to the mortgaged property. It is now clear that these title deeds which were produced into Court during the pendency of Kuppu Rao's suit have remained in Court and were not taken possession of by any of the parties. The circumstance that in some notice given by a lawyer on behalf of defendants 1 to 3 an attempt was made to explain away plaintiff's possible possession of title deeds on a wrong assumption of plaintiff being in possession thereof cannot have much significance in face of this proved fact. On behalf of defendant 4 it has been contended that even on the footing that the plaintiff is entitled to claim to be subrogated to the position of Kuppu Rao, plaintiff must be postponed to defendant 4 on the ground of gross negligence in not taking active steps to have a legal mortgage executed in due course as contemplated by Exs. A and Y.

That the plaintiff had been very unbusinesslike in securing his rights cannot be denied. It is however not clear whether the case is directly within the terms of S. 78, T. P. Act. Plaintiff can only claim an equitable right of subrogation and cannot claim to be a mortgagee in whose favour a mortgage deed as contemplated by the Transfer of Property Act has been executed. Even if the case should be held to be governed by S. 78, there is a considerable force in the contention advanced on behalf of defendant 4 that if defendant 4 was really a bona fide lender, she has been misled into lending her money in ignorance of the plaintiff's right, as the plaintiff had not taken diligent steps to have a legal mortgage executed in his favour. The argument of the learned Judge that defendant 4's failure to call for the title deeds is sufficient to postpone her claim to the plaintiff's does not seem to us sustainable. It may be well founded if the plaintiff had the custody of the title deeds, because it is only in favour of the person in possession of the title deeds that the doctrine of constructive notice can be invoked on the ground of the omission of the other party to call for them. It being established in this case that the title deeds remained in Court, there is no basis for a finding against defendant 4 as a question of law merely on the ground of her failure to call for the title deeds. This failure however will have a material bearing in determining the question whether defendant 4 was in fact an honest lender.

Looking at the matter from another point of view, the plaintiff must be regarded as a person who had an agreement in his favour for the execution of a formal deed of mortgage. If defendant 4 was not a transferee for value without notice of the agreement in plaintiff's favour, plaintiff will undoubtedly be entitled in a suit for specific performance to get a security which will have precedence over defendant 4's claim. There is no reason why that consideration should not be kept in view in dealing with the relative rights of parties even on the footing that the plaintiff has become a mortgagee by subrogation. The question therefore that arises for decision from either point of view is whether defendant 4 was a bona fide lender without notice of the plaintiff's claim. The only relevant evidence on that point is that of her husband, D. W. 3. I am free to admit that his evidence is far from convincing, and on several matters it is undoubtedly open to criticizm. There is however one consideration which defendant 4 is entitled to urge, namely that there is on record no suggestion of any reason or motive for defendant 4 or her husband to get mixed up in any fraudulent scheme of defendants 1 and 3 to cheat the plaintiff's claim and much less of any reason for D. W. 3 to perjure himself to support such a scheme. Notwithstanding the defects in the evidence of D. W. 3, the learned trial Judge seems to have been prepared to accept his evidence and has found in positive terms that defendant 4 was an innocent lender. The circumstances of the case are not in our opinion such as to justify our dissenting from that finding of fact. The result is that while the plaintiff will be entitled to a decree as on a charge against the suit property, his claim will be postponed to that of defendant 4 under Ex. 6. The decree of the lower Court will be modified accordingly. Appeal No. 80 is allowed to this extent : the appellant will be entitled to the costs of the appeal from the plaintiff. Appeal No. 13 is dismissed with costs of the plaintiff. The appellant in Appeal No. 13 will pay the court-fee due to Government on the memorandum of appeal.

Leach C. J.—I agree with the judgment of my learned brother and I have nothing to add.

Palandi Naidu and others —
Respondents.

Appeal No. 500 of 1931, Decided on 7th September 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, Chingleput, in O. S. No. 9 of 1928.

* * (a) Defamation — Communication by client to pleader not in connexion with any judicial proceeding or step thereto is not absolutely privileged—Such communication, when false, intended to be published to certain party and actuated by malice will not be protected.

The doctrine of absolute privilege is based on the fact that in the public interest it is not desirable to inquire whether the words or acts of certain persons are malicious or not ; it is a right of the public, the theory being "public advantage almost amounting to public necessity." That is why a party communicating any matter to a solicitor in connexion with any judicial proceeding or in connexion with any necessary step preliminary thereto is absolutely immune from an action. But unless the communication is in any of these connexions, it would not be absolutely privileged. Every client in seeking legal advice is expected to put before his legal adviser the true and correct facts on which legal advice is sought. If the facts are known to be false to the knowledge of the client, he is not really seeking or expecting any proper legal advice at all but is attempting to make an improper use of the confidential relationship for purposes of his own. And there is neither reason for, nor public necessity nor public benefit in, according absolute immunity from liability to action to such communications. This is why the law has always classed such communications under the head of qualified privilege. [P 167 C 2; P 168 C 1; P 169 C 1, 2]

Where therefore a false communication is made by a client to his pleader, not in connexion with any judicial proceeding but is intended to be published to a party and is actuated by malice, such communication will not be protected and party responsible for the communication will be liable in damages. [P 170 C 2]

(b) Common Law—Applicability — Where Common law is uncertain, Indian High Court can apply law which is equitable.

Where the principles of Common law in England are in a state of uncertainty, there is nothing to preclude High Courts in India applying that view of the law which is essentially just and equitable. [P 170 C 1]

Venkataramana Rao J. — This is an appeal from the decree of the learned District Judge of Chingleput dismissing an action for damages for defamation instituted by plaintiffs 1 and 2. The defamatory matter complained of was a communication made by defendants 1 and 2 to one Mr. G. Krishnamachari, a vakil at Chingleput and repeated by the said vakil in a letter dated 9th May 1927 addressed to plaintiff 1. Plaintiff 2 is the daughter of plaintiff 1 and the wife of defendant 2. Defendant 1 is the father of defendant 2. The matter complained of was concerning plaintiff 2 in the letter addressed as aforesaid to plaintiff 1 by the said Krishnamachari to the following effect :

On or about 7th January 1927, your daughter Balambal ran away with one Manika Asari from her husband clandestinely and was staying with him at Kadambathur for two days.

Plaintiff 2 was married to defendant 2 in or about 1925 and was living with her husband till about March 1927. Some time towards the latter part of 1926, misunderstandings seemed to have arisen between plaintiff 2 and the defendants in regard to the kasimalai worn by plaintiff 2 and alleged to have been taken away from her by her husband, defendant 2, and not returned in spite of demand. As a result of this misunderstanding, plaintiff 2 had to leave her husband's home and go to her parents' house in or about March 1927. On 25th April 1927, plaintiff 1 addressed a letter to his son-in-law, defendant 2, complaining about the ill-treatment accorded to his daughter during her stay in his house in consequence of the misunderstandings, and requesting him to take his wife and live with her. In answer to the said letter, defendants 1 and 2 instructed their vakil, Mr. Krishnamachari, to issue the letter dated 9th May 1927. On receipt thereof, plaintiff 1 through his vakil, Mr. Nageswara Iyer, complained of the defamatory character of the communication contained in the letter of 9th May 1927 and called upon them to unconditionally withdraw the same and apologize for the wrongful act. The defendants having failed and neglected to comply with the said request, plaintiff 1 instituted a complaint of defamation under S. 500, Penal Code. The Joint Magistrate of Chingleput found that the defamatory matter complained of, namely the running away of plaintiff 2 with Manika Asari, was false and convicted them of the offence charged. The present suit was instituted for recovery of damages. The material allegations are contained in paras. 4, 5 and 9 of the plaint and they are as follows :

(4). Subsequently, on 25th April 1927, plaintiff 1 gave a registered notice to defendant 2 requesting him to take back plaintiff 2 to his house and the defendants sent a reply dated 9th May 1927 accusing plaintiff 2 of having run away with one Manika Asari and having lived with him for two days at Kadambathur. (5). The allegation is absolutely false and was made quite maliciously and recklessly and was intended not only to ruin the character of plaintiff 2 but also to ruin her for life and brand her as an unchaste woman. (9). The defendants are therefore liable in damages to the plaintiffs for having unnecessarily defamed plaintiff 2 . . . Plaintiff 1 is also damnified by the false allegations against his daughter and is also entitled to damages.

Before the filing of the written statement, defendant 1 seemed to have asked for particulars of the precise words complained of as being defamatory and the dates when and the persons to whom and the place where the defamatory matter was published by the defendants. In answer thereto, the plaintiffs gave particulars wherein the plaintiffs distinctly stated that they sued in respect of the statement contained in the notice of the defendants dated 9th May 1927 which has been already quoted above. In regard to the publication complained of, it was stated to be at Chingleput and in regard to the person complained of it was alleged thus :

The publication was made to defendant 1 by defendant 2 in the first instance, then by both, to the vakil who gave the reply notice, and again was repeated in the Court of the joint Magistrate, Chingleput.

In regard to the damages claimed, the plaintiffs contented themselves with the claim for damages on behalf of plaintiff 2. After the receipt of particulars, the defendants filed a written statement. Their main pleas were two-fold: (1) justification of the matter complained of, and (2) privilege. This second plea is worded thus :

They claim absolute immunity or absolute privilege and if not, in any event, on account of a defeasible immunity or qualified privilege attaching to the alleged defamation by reason of the occasion of the publication by defendant 1 to defendant 2 and by both to their vakil.

The learned District Judge found that the defamatory matter was in substance true and that the evidence established that plaintiff 2 ran away with Manika Asari from her husband clandestinely, but she did not live with him for two days and that portion of the matter must be found to be false. He further held that, even assuming the plea of justification could not be made out, the defendants were absolutely privileged in making the statement by reason of the fact that the communication was made to Mr. G. Krishnamachari, their legal adviser. He thought that in view of his finding as to the absolute privilege, the issue as to qualified privilege did not arise; however he was inclined to think that the plaintiffs have not proved that the defendants were actuated by malice in making and publishing such a statement. As a result of these findings, the learned District Judge dismissed the plaintiffs' suit.

This appeal is preferred by plaintiff 2 and the findings of the learned District Judge both on questions of fact and law have been canvassed by her counsel, Mr. Rajah Iyer. On the admitted facts one thing seems to be clear. If the plea of justification is found against, there was the admitted publication of the defamatory matter to plaintiff 1 which would sustain a cause of action in favour of plaintiff 2 for damages, and the defendants cannot escape liability therefor unless they are able to sustain and prove that they were not actuated by malice in making the said statement. But it is rather curious that this seems to have escaped the notice and attention of the counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs as well as the Court below, and the case seems to have been fought out on the question whether there was absolute privilege by reason of the communication by the defendants to their legal adviser, assuming the plea of justification was found against. So, before dealing with the question of privilege, if plaintiff 2 is to succeed, she has to displace the finding in regard to justification. Mr. Rajah Iyer therefore first took up that point and proceeded to canvass the finding of the learned District Judge in regard thereto. (After discussing the evidence his Lordship proceeded further.) Thus the evidence and probabilities completely establish that the case set up by the defendants that plaintiff 2 eloped with Manika Asari and lived for two days with him is false. There can be no doubt—and it is not denied that the matter complained of is per se defamatory—that the said statement is untrue, malicious and has been made deliberately with a view to escape the possibility of any claim on the part of plaintiff 2. The plea of justification cannot therefore prevail and must be rejected.

The next question is, is the plea of privilege sustainable? Under the English law from the earliest times for the discharge of public duties and for due administration of law and for the welfare and convenience of society and for the transaction of the affairs of society in the ordinary course of daily life, it was thought necessary there should be freedom of speech and freedom of communication; and for that purpose the law has always recognized certain occasions as privileged conferring immunity from liability to an action either absolutely or conditionally, and commonly known as absolute privilege, and qualified privilege. Where the plea is sought on the ground of absolute privilege the Courts are precluded from discussing the good faith of the party who utters or publishes the defamatory statement. If the plea relied on is one of qualified privilege, the immunity the law confers is destroyed by proof of malice. Among the recognized classes of cases to which the doctrine of absolute privilege is held to apply are statements made in the course of judicial proceedings. The reason of the rule is thus stated by Folkard on the Law of Slander and Libel at pp. 88 and 89:

> And the reason is founded on the principle that 'the law will rather suffer a private mischief than a public inconvenience"; and that persons engaged in the administration of the law, and those who seek justice in respect of wrongs or injuries suffered or give evidence as to any such, or make defence thereto, may not be deterred from so doing by the fear of being harassed by actions or prosecutions for defamation in respect thereof. And accordingly the law, without regard to the question of intention and on grounds of obvious policy, repels the claim to damages in respect of any publication, whether oral or written, made in the ordinary course of a judicial proceeding civil or criminal. And this rule applies to Judges, juries, witnesses, suitors and parties, in respect of anything stated by them in the course of any such proceeding.

As Brett J. observed in (1883) 11 Q B D 588,[1] it does not matter whether the defendants spoke the words maliciously or without any justification and whether the words spoken were irrelevant. It is not necessary to refer to many cases and it is sufficient if I should refer to (1859) 4 H & N 569=157 E R 964,[2] where Earle C. J. observed thus:

> An action will not lie for defamatory words spoken in the course of litigation which are relevant to that litigation. The authorities are collected in the note to 1 Wms. Saund, 131b, Note 1,[3] and the general rule is there stated: "No false or scandalous matter contained in articles of the peace exhibited to justices of the peace, or in any other proceeding in a regular course of justice, will make it libellous". Several authorities are cited; they extend over many centuries down to the time when the learned annotator collected them. In (1759) 2 Burr 807,[4] where such an action was brought in the Court of King's Bench in Lord Mansfield's time, that learned Judge endeavoured to stop the counsel by saying, "shew that a matter given in evidence in a Court of justice may be prosecuted in a civil action as a libel. The Court, indeed before which such evidence is given may censure it". The party may be punished, and the abuse repressed by a prosecution for perjury the result of which is to make the defendant infamous if he is convicted. It is said that the civil remedy should be allowed for the purpose of indemnifying the party injured. But the balance of inconvenience is strong against such an action: (1859) 157 E R 964[2] at p. 967.

The principle was applied to a case from India by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 11 Beng L R 321.[5] Speaking with reference to the privilege of a witness, their Lordships observed thus at page 328:

> Their Lordships hold this maxim which certainly has been recognized by all the Courts of this country to be one based upon principles of public policy. The ground of it is this: that it concerns the public and the administration of justice that witnesses giving their evidence on oath in a Court of justice should not have before their eyes the fear of being harassed by suits for damages; but that the only penalty which they should incur if they give evidence falsely should be an indictment for perjury.

There is sense and reason in the rule that was adopted by the English Courts. The Court has superintendence over what happens before it and can, as Earle C. J. points out in (1859) 4 H & N 569[2], prevent reckless utterances defaming or slandering others by either censuring the party or the witness or by taking proceedings for perjury: vide Folkard on Libel and Slander p. 97. But it will be seen that two conditions are necessary in order that a party may avail himself of this privilege: (1) the proceeding must be judicial and (2) the utterance must have been made in the capacity of a suitor or a litigant in the course of and with reference to such proceeding. Odgers on Libel and Slander (1905 Edn.) at p. 230 puts it thus:

> But the proceeding must be in its nature judicial, that is, it must be either the adjudication and determination by a competent tribunal of the legal rights of the parties before it, or some necessary step preliminary thereto.

As an illustration to this rule, Odgers relies on (1876) 1 A C 307[6] and states the effect of that decision thus:

> The service on a debtor of a notice under the Canadian Insolvent Act of 1869, demanding payment of a debt, though an important piece of evidence should bankruptcy proceedings follow, is not in itself a judicial proceeding; and the delivery of such a notice to lawyer's clerk for service is privileged, but not an absolutely privileged publication.

It is on this principle that statements in pleadings, affidavits or applications made to Court have been held to be absolutely privileged and the principle is extended to cases where instructions are given to a legal adviser for the preparation of a proof before trial, (1905) A C 480,[7] but the rule of public policy does not extend the protection any further. Spencer Bower in his book on Actionable Defamation, at p. 92, explains the scope of the privilege thus:

> Such expression (published in the course and for the purpose of any judicial proceeding) does not apply to or include any publication of defamatory matter before the commencement or after the termination of the judicial proceeding unless such publication is an act incidental to the proper initiation thereof, or the giving of legal effect thereto; nor does it apply to or include any publication of defamatory matter to any person other than those to whom, or in any place other than that in which, such publication is required or authorized by law to be made for the proper conduct of the judicial proceeding.

Unless therefore a communication is made to a solicitor in connexion with a judicial proceeding or in connexion with a necessary step preliminary thereto or with reference to an act incidental to the proper initiation thereof, (1908) 1 K B 584[8] at pp. 588 and 589, it would not be absolutely privileged and therefore prima facie the communication made by defendants 1 and 2 to Mr. Krishnamachari in connexion with the reply notice dated 9th of May would not be protected by the absolute immunity from liability to an action. But in 1928 the Court of Appeal in England seems to have extended the doctrine of absolute privilege even to communications between a solicitor and a client though not connected with any judicial proceeding or a necessary step preliminary thereto. In (1928) 2 K B 520[9], Scrutton L. J. enunciated this view of the law relying on the observations of Lord Herschell and Lord Bowen in (1893) 6 Rep 67,[10] and on a passage from Fraser on Libel and Slander and differing from the view of Darling J. in (1917) 33 T L R 495.[11] If the case in (1893) 6 Rep 67[10] is examined, it does not seem to support the view of Scrutton L. J. The defamatory matter complained of was a statement taken by a solicitor from a client for the purpose of obtaining an authority to take proceedings against the plaintiff, who brought an action for defamation against the solicitor. What Lord Herschell said was :

> When communications pass between a solicitor and those who he reasonably believes will desire to retain him, and to whom he makes a communication in relation to that, and who do retain him, the whole of the communications leading up to the retainer and relevant to it, and having that and nothing else in view, are privileged communications, that the whole occasion is throughout privileged.

But he in more than one place points out that there was no evidence of malice in that case, and throughout, his discussion was to establish that the defendant was not actuated by malice in uttering or publishing the defamatory matter. Bowen L. J., while affirming the view taken by Lord Herschell in regard to the communication as falling within the category of professional privilege, observed that he very much doubted whether malice destroyed that kind of privilege, unless it was shown that what had passed was not germane to the occasion. He more than once stated that that point was not necessary to be decided and that he would desire to keep it open. The observations in this case were never understood by the leading text writers on the law on libel and slander, except Fraser, as establishing that communications between a solicitor and a client, once the relationship is established, are absolutely privileged. For example, Odgers at p. 246 (4th Edn. 1905) cites (1893) 6 Rep 67,[10] under the head of qualified privilege. This question of absolute privilege came up for discussion before the House of Lords in the case in (1930) A C 558,[12] where every Law Lord expressed the opinion that the case in (1928) 2 K B 520,[9] required reconsideration. Lord Buckmaster there observed :

> I only desire to add without decision that it does not follow that when once the privilege due to the relationship is waived, the privilege of the occasion is absolute.

Viscount Dunedin remarked thus :

> It must be admitted that the older authorities point rather the other way, and that the privilege of solicitor and client has been generally dealt with in the books as qualified privilege.

Later Lord Atkin also remarked thus :

> The decision considerably extends the protection which up to its date had been confined to communications made by Judge, counsel and witnesses in the course of judicial proceedings, and is based upon a view of public policy which appears to be somewhat widely stated and is certainly not the view accepted in Scotland. I prefer to leave the correctness of the decision entirely open for consideration hereafter in this House.

It will be seen that the view of Viscount Dunedin is that the older authorities are the other way. A confidential communication between a solicitor and client has always been treated under the head of qualified privilege because the communication is supposed to have been made in the protection of self-interest or by reason of common interest existing between the party communicating and the party communicated to. The rule is that for the welfare and convenience of society, the occasion must be deemed to be prima facie privileged unless it is shown that the communication was made with an improper motive. Street, in his book on the Foundations of Legal Liability, Vol. 1, observes thus at page 311 :

> One of the most extensive heads of qualified privilege is found in connexion with communications between individuals concerning matters that are of moment to one or both of the parties. Communications between parties occupying confidential relations, as between principal and agent, master and servant, physician and patient, attorney and client, clergyman and parishioner, parent and child, are privileged so far as the substance of such communications pertains to matters about which the relation of confidence exists. Here the parties have a common interest in the subject matter of the communication.

Odgers in his book (4th Edn. 1905) at p. 230, expresses the opinion that "a case laid before counsel for his opinion is not absolutely privileged at all events, if no writ yet issued", and cites an unreported case, Minter v. Brockman. If the reason of the rule is examined, this view seems to be sound. The doctrine of absolute privilege is, as pointed out by Channel J. in (1908) 1 K B 584,[8] based on the fact that in the public interest it is not desirable to enquire whether the words or acts of certain persons are malicious or not; he would prefer to call it a right of the public, the theory being "public advantage almost amounting to public necessity." That is why, as already pointed out, a party communicating any matter to a solicitor in connexion with any judicial proceeding or in connexion with any necessary step preliminary thereto is absolutely immune from an action. Moreover, the Court in the exercise of its supervision over the judicial proceeding has got the means, as already pointed out, to censure or punish the party. But no such safeguard is available in the case of communications where the matter does not come to Court. The privilege relating to a communication between a solicitor and client is a very ancient head of privilege in order to encourage free intercourse between them and this is the foundation of the principle that communications between a lawyer and client should not be disclosed without the permission of the client. Therefore the law does give an adequate safeguard in protecting such communications from disclosure. There is no reason why, having this protection, they should also be immune from liability to an action, when the said protection is not availed of and the communications are made, not with a view to being kept confidential but intended to be published to a party. Every client in seeking legal advice is expected to put before his legal adviser the true and correct facts on which legal advice is sought. If the facts are known to be false to the knowledge of the client, he is not really seeking or expecting any proper legal advice at all, but is attempting to make an improper use of the confidential relationship for purposes of his own. And there is neither reason for nor public necessity nor public benefit in according absolute immunity from liability to action to such communications. That is why the law has always classed such communications, until the decision of the Court of Appeal, under the head of qualified privilege, so that if the communication was not made from an indirect motive or actuated by any malice, the law gave such communications the protection. The Courts have also dealt with the matter under the head of qualified privilege. In (1917) 33 T L R 495[11] a defamatory matter uttered by a solicitor in delivering a bill of costs to his client was held not to be absolutely privileged. Justice Darling in that case observed thus :

> Mr. Lewis Thomas contended that the occasion was absolutely privileged, which means that it is like the reports of what passes in these Courts or what is in a legal document issued by authority. I cannot see any reason to suppose that a solicitor is endowed with the right to publish whatever he likes about everybody provided that it is in a bill of costs . . . . . if a solicitor puts into his bill of costs matters not necessary for the information of the client in order that he may know for what he is paying, or that he may get the bill properly taxed, if there is evidence that he put them in out of malice, then the privilege would be destroyed. I know that I am perhaps giving a decision on the point of law to which Lord Bowen referred. I must give it. That is my view about it.

I may say that this view is in consonance with that of Bramwell J. in a very early decision, (1858-67) 1 F & F 668= 175 E R 899,[13] and this case has been cited with approval by Folkard in his book on 'Law of Slander and Libel' at p. 98 (also Odgers, 4th Edition, 231; 6th Edition 202). It may be observed that in the article on Libel and Slander by Vaughan Williams L. J. in Vol. 18, Halsbury's Laws of England (1st Edition), para. 1254, absolute privilege in connexion with judicial proceedings is limited to proceedings at the trial and to the proceedings which are essentially steps in judicial proceedings; but Lord Hewart C. J. in the Hailsham Edition, para. 465, seems to extend this by including under this head not only statements in pleadings but also communications passing between a solicitor and client, relying on (1928) 2 K B 520.[9] The editor of Salmond on Torts in the latest edition observes that it is uncertain whether the privilege is absolute or qualified. This is the state of the English law at present.

18. Bruton v. Downes, (1858-1867) 1 F & F 668= 175 E R 899.

If the view which prevailed before the decision of the Court of Appeal in (1928) 2 K B 520[9] is taken, there can be no doubt that the communication made by the defendants to Mr. Krishnamachari on 9th May 1927 would come only under the head of qualified privilege.

Coming to the Indian decisions, a distinction is drawn between an action for defamation in a Civil Court and a criminal prosecution for defamation. In regard to the latter, it has been held that the absolute privilege accorded in England to a party or a witness or an advocate in connexion with judicial proceedings cannot apply; it is only qualified privilege and it must come within one of the exceptions of S 499, I. P. C. : vide 49 Mad 728;[14] 48 Cal 388[15] and 50 Bom 162.[16] The reason given is that the law having been codified by statute, the latter must prevail. But for civil wrongs there has been no such codification and the rule of law that is applicable is justice, equity and good conscience. It is no doubt anomalous that in connexion with the same matter one principle of law should apply for the purpose of a criminal case and another for the purpose of a civil action. But the anomaly is there, and until the Legislature intervenes it must be recognized. However, the rule which is now to be applied for the case on hand is the rule of justice, equity and good conscience, which has been generally understood to be the principles of Common law in England so far as they are applicable to Indian society having regard to the circumstances of the case. But where the principles of Common law in England are in a state of uncertainty, there is nothing to preclude us applying that view of the law which is essentially just and equitable, cf. 8 Mad 175,[17] and which is in consonance with the principle on which the doctrine of privilege is based. In our opinion, the older view of treating communications like the one in question under the head of qualified privilege ought to be the rule of justice, equity and good conscience. Even in England authority is not wanting for the view that the doctrine of absolute privilege should not be extended: vide Lopes L. J. in (1892) 1 Q B 431[18] at p. 451. And where the Indian Legislature has chosen to depart for the purpose of criminal law from the doctrine of absolute privilege as applied by the Common law of England, it seems to us that the extension made in (1928) 2 K B 520[9] should not be adopted here. Therefore the defendants cannot escape liability for their wrongful act, unless it is proved that in so doing they were not actuated by malice. We have already found that the words spoken concerning plaintiff 2 were false and made from an improper motive. As observed by Lord Esher in (1892) 1 Q B 431[18] at page 443 :

> If a person on such an occasion states what he knows to be untrue, no one ever doubted that he would be abusing the occasion.

Lord Justice Lopes in the same case said :

> If it be proved that out of anger or for some other wrong motive the defendant has stated as true that which he does not know to be true, and he has stated it not stopping or taking the trouble to ascertain whether it is true or not—stated it recklessly by reason of his anger or other indirect motive—the jury may infer that he used the occasion not for the reason which justifies it, but for the gratification of his anger or other indirect motive.

Applying these principles to this case, we have no hesitation in finding that the defendants were actuated by malice in uttering and publishing the matter complained of. In this view it is unnecessary to deal with the application for amendment of the plaint made by Mr. Rajah Iyer requesting leave to amend by claiming damages for the publication of the defamatory matter to plaintiff 1. The only question that remains for consideration is the question of damages. We think in the circumstances of this case an award of Rs. 500 would meet the ends of justice. We therefore reverse the decision of the learned District Judge and pass a decree in favour of the appellant (plaintiff 2) for the sum of Rs. 500 with interest at 6 per cent. from the date of plaint. The appellant will have her costs both here and in the Court below.

Appeal No. 367 of 1933, Decided on 6th October 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, South Malabar at Calicut, in O. S. No. 35 of 1932.

Malabar Compensation for Tenants Improvements Act (1 of 1900) — Benefit conferred by Act does not extend to lessees of buildings or houses or shops.

The definition of the word 'tenant' in the Act is a clear indication that the Legislature did not intend that buildings or houses or shops should come within the purview of the Act. Hence the benefit conferred by the Act does not extend to tenants of buildings, houses or of shops: *A I R 1927 Mad 776 and L. P. As. Venkatasubba Rao J.—There was a mortgage granted on 1st July 1923 by defendant 1 and his deceased brother in favour of plaintiffs 1 to 3 and another, which comprised 27 items. The transaction, we understand, was one of simple mortgage in respect of 23 out of them and in regard to the remaining four items, what was created was a usufructuary mortgage, which was to subsist for nine years. On the same date, the aforesaid four items were taken back by the mortgagors on lease for a period of five years. This suit has been brought to recover the items comprised in the lease with arrears of rent. The appellant before us is defendant 36, claiming under an alleged lease from the mortgagors, who complains that the lower Court has wrongly disallowed his claim to improvements.

Turning first to the pleadings, it is noticeable that in the written statement filed by the appellant no such claim was made. There it is stated that he lent large sums to the mortgagors, who further caused him to expend moneys for improving or altering the property, that it was found upon a settlement with them that Rs. 3000 was due to him and that provision was made for its repayment in the rental agreement executed by defendant 1 in his favour on 16th May 1931. Then he goes on to describe how by means of some kind of adjustment spread over six years, the period of the lease, the full amount was to be paid back to him. It is impossible to read into this written statement a claim to improvements. Then at the trial, no serious attempt seems to have been made to adduce evidence on the question of improvements. Indeed, it has not even been proved that defendant 36 was a lessee for six years, or that he was in possession even previous to the date of the mortgage as suggested. Neither the original lease deed nor the rental agreement of 1931 was produced or filed. Apart from these matters, there is an objection, which in our opinion is fatal to his claim. In the written statement it is alleged (there is no reason why he should not be held bound by his own admission) that the lease was in respect of a shop and not, as now suggested, a shop and a paramba.

On the footing then that what was leased to defendant 36 was a shop pure and simple, the question arises whether he can claim the benefit conferred upon tenants by Act 1 of 1900 (the Malabar Compensation for Tenants Improvements Act). The word "tenant" is defined as including a person, who as lessee, etc. "of land, is in possession thereof." Here is a clear indication that the Legislature did not intend that buildings or houses or shops should come within the purview of the Act, and the argument is fanciful that because a building must necessarily stand upon land, therefore it comes within the scope of the Act. The expression in the Act must receive its natural meaning and we are not prepared to hold that the benefit conferred by it extends to tenants of buildings. In 50 Mad 813,[1] there is a judgment of Jackson J. where this view has been taken, and with that we respectfully agree. It was held that whereas the Act applies to agricultural holdings and kudiyiruppus (vacant sites available for buildings), it does not apply to houses or shops. In subsequent decisions, this case has been referred to but never dissented from. In A I R 1928 Mad 929,[2] the facts are these. What was "entrusted" to the defendants was a hut, but the new house which they built covered a considerably larger area than the site of the hut. Reilly J. held that even if the defendants were tenants of the hut, they were not tenants of the area outside the site of the hut, and from this it followed that the new house did not constitute a tenant's improvement. But Srinivasa Aiyangar J. bases his decision expressly on the ground, following the case just cited, that the lease was of a building. The suggestion that Reilly J. in this case casts a doubt on the correctness in 50 Mad 813[1] is not well founded. Nor has it been called in question in either of the two later decisions, 60 M L J 214[3] or 55 Mad 151,[4] to which our attention has been called, although in the former case there are observations to the effect that it was unnecessary to express any opinion on the question whether the Act applies to lease of buildings or shops. Now turning to the actual decisions in these two cases, in 60 M L J 214,[3] "what was let was a compound or paramba or kudiyiruppu" (see p. 216) and it was held that the lessee was entitled to compensation in respect of the house which he constructed on the vacant site: In 55 Mad 151,[4]

> the appellant obtained the property, which was a vacant site, on lease for erecting a house for residential purposes, (p. 152)

and he was held entitled to the value of the house which he built. The present case differs from them and resembles 50 Mad 813,[1] where, as here, the lease was of a building which case, we may note, has been followed without discussion by a Bench of this Court (Wallace and Thiruvenkatachariar JJ.) in L. P. As. Nos. 17 to 22 of 1925. This lends support to our view of the section. In the result the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Criminal Revn. Case No. 296 and Petn. No. 272 of 1937, Decided on 23rd September 1937, from order of Stationary Sub-Magistrate, Gobichettipalayam, D/- 5th April 1937.

(a) Criminal Misappropriation—Actual conversion or appropriation is necessary — Mere intention or preparation is not sufficient.

Before a Court frames a charge of criminal misappropriation, it must satisfy itself that actual conversion or appropriation has taken place, because mere intention to misappropriate or even preparation to that end are not sufficient to constitute the offence. [P 173 C 1, 2]

(b) Criminal Misappropriation—High standard of honesty of persons finding property is expected — What a person coming across property should do, explained (Obiter).

A very high standard of honesty is demanded of the finders of lost property. Before appropriating it, they must attempt to find the owner, if they have means of so doing. If there is no clue to the owner, the finder must use all reasonable means to find the owner and must wait a reasonable time to allow the owner to claim the property before he appropriates it. [P 173 C 1]

(c) Penal Code (1860), S. 411 — Lost currency note found by child—Possession traced to accused and recovery made — No offence under S. 411 held proved.

A person lost his currency notes. They were found by a child in street from whom they came into possession of accused, to whom those notes were traced after a short time and were ultimately recovered after a certain amount of denial :

Held that the facts did not constitute any offence under S. 411. [P 173 C 2]

Order.—This is a revision petition asking the Court to quash a charge framed under S. 411, I. P. C., against three persons. The facts appear to be as follows : P. W. 2, while waiting to deposit money into the bank at Gobichettipalayam lost from his shirt pocket four currency notes of the value of one hundred rupees each. He noticed this loss at about 10 A. M. The four notes were picked up in the street by P. W. 6, a child of 6. P. W. 6 gave a young friend of his (P. W. 7) one note, but P. W. 7 was insisting on getting two. Their wrangles attracted the attention of a passing barber (P. W. 4) who snatched all four notes from them. The children clamoured for the return of the notes and held his coat, but the barber took them with him to hand them and the money over to P. W. 6's father, whom he knew. On the way he met P. W. 6's grandmother (accused 1). She asked where he was taking P. W. 6 and on being told the facts, she claimed a prior right to these notes. So P. W. 4 handed over the four notes to her, but he went on and told P. W. 6's father (accused 2) what had happened.

Accused 2's employer (accused 3) also heard the story from the barber. It appears that accused 2 and 3 then sent for accused 1 and each of them took one one-hundred rupee note from her. P. W. 4 came back later to accused 3's shop in which accused 2 is employed and was paid Rs. 20 by accused 3 as a reward for his pains and as an inducement to keep his mouth shut. Meantime, the owner of the notes (P. W. 2) was making inquiries and had got a policeman to help him in his search. Some people fortunately for the owner had seen the barber (P. W. 4) take the notes from the children. The barber (P. W. 4) was soon found and he referred the policeman to the boy's grandmother. When first questioned P. W. 6's grandmother (accused 1) denied all knowledge, but later she produced two currency notes of one hundred rupees each. Accused 2 (P. W. 6's father) produced one one hundred rupee note and also a ten rupee note. These notes were recovered by 12 noon, that is, within two hours. At 3 P. M. accused 3 was questioned and at first he denied all knowledge, but as soon as he was arrested produced the last of the hundred rupee notes. The last note was recovered by 3 P. M.

Assuming these facts to be true, the question arises what if any offence has been committed. Expln. 2 to S. 403, I. P. C., lays down the law in regard to property found. A very high standard of honesty is demanded of the finders of lost property. Before appropriating it, they must attempt to find the owner, if they have means of so doing. If there is no clue to the owner, the finder must use all reasonable means to find the owner and must wait a reasonable time to allow the owner to claim the property before he appropriates it. Now it is clear, if the facts stated above are proved, that there was a dishonest intention to appropriate the notes, an intention shared by all three accused, just as the notes were shared. The difficulty is to say whether appropriation or conversion to their own use had actually taken place, whether the matter went beyond the stage of intention and preparation. I must leave this difficult question to the learned Magistrate to decide for himself after hearing all the evidence. Perhaps the best defence to a charge of criminal misappropriation in these circumstances would be to admit dishonest intention and even preparation to commit criminal misappropriation, but to deny actual appropriation or conversion, and to plead in extenuation that the standard set for the finders of money is much above the standard of popular opinion.

I must dismiss this revision petition with the remark that the charge framed under S. 411, I. P. C., is inapplicable to the facts and tends to obscure the real issue. If the prosecution satisfactorily proves the facts extracted above, and if the learned Magistrate is able to find after hearing the defence case that actual appropriation of the notes was complete or that the accused actually converted the notes to their own use, then the offence committed by all three accused is clearly the offence of criminal misappropriation. The charge under S. 411, I. P. C., is hereby quashed and the Magistrate is directed to make further inquiry into this case and to consider in the light of the above remarks whether he should frame a charge under S. 403, I. P. C., or discharge the accused. Nothing that I have said should prejudice the Magistrate in deciding one way or the other in this matter. The petition is allowed.

Order. — This is an application asking the Court to revise an order of the Fourth Presidency Magistrate made in the following circumstances. In a suit on a pronote for Rs. 200, plaintiff applied for attachment before judgment of the defendant's moveable property. The Court ordered notice to defendant. The notice was returned with an endorsement that it had been personally served on defendant. As defendant did not appear, attachment was ordered. As soon as the bailiff went to effect attachment, the defendant paid up. The defendant complains that his signature on the reverse of the notice was forged by the clerk of the plaintiff's advocate and the forged document was used to stifle his objections to attachment before judgment.

The defendant, after about a month's delay, moved the Court to prosecute the clerk of plaintiff's vakil and also filed a private complaint against him and also applied under S. 95, Civil P. C., for compensation against plaintiff for attachment before judgment without reasonable and probable cause. The Court declined to prosecute the plaintiff's vakil's clerk on 11th January 1937, and dismissed the application for compensation under S. 95, Civil P. C. on 17th December 1936. But the defendant's private complaint against plaintiff's vakil's clerk has been taken cognizance of. This petitioner requests that the order of the Fourth Presidency Magistrate deciding to go on with this private case should be revised.

The principle underlying S. 195, Criminal P. C., is plainly this. Where an act amounts to the offence of contempt of the lawful authority of public servants (Ss. 172-188, I. P. C.), or to an offence against public justice such as giving false evidence (Section 193, et seq., I. P. C.), or to an offence relating to documents actually used in a Court (S. 471 etc.), private prosecutions are barred absolutely, and only the Court in relation to which the offence was committed may initiate proceedings. This salutary rule of law is founded on common sense. The dignity and prestige of Courts of law must be upheld by their presiding officers, and it would never do to leave it to parties aggrieved to achieve in one prosecution gratification of personal revenge and vindication of a Court's honour and prestige. To allow this would be to sacrifice deliberately the dispassionate and impartial calm of tribunals and to allow a Court's prestige to be the sport of personal passions. The offence alleged to have been committed here by the clerk of the plaintiff's vakil is undoubtedly an offence against public justice, punishable under S. 193, I. P. C., and possibly also under S. 199, I. P. C. The Court in its discretion has declined to prosecute on the ground that there was not a strong prima facie case and that no prosecution at all is far better than a prosecution which is likely to prove abortive.

The defendant cannot be allowed to prosecute merely because he feels that he has been personally dishonoured. It is not indeed clear how such a prosecution can vindicate his honour. The refusal of the Court to prosecute is final. It must mean that there should be no prosecution at all for this alleged offence. The complainant, who is animated by a sense of personal grievance, cannot be allowed or trusted to be an impartial advocate and deputy of the Court in the role of prosecutor. I allow this petition. The complaint is dismissed as barred by S. 195 (b), Criminal P. C.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 985 of 1936, Decided on 27th August 1937, from order of Dist. Court, Ramnad, D/- 11th July 1936.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, R. 90—Fact that inadequate price was due to irregularity in sale need not be proved by direct evidence—Sale can be set aside if there are facts from which it can be reasonably inferred that low price was due to irregularity.

The substitution in O. 21, R. 90 of the words "unless upon the facts proved the Court is satisfied" has removed the necessity of proving by direct evidence that the inadequate price was caused by reason of the alleged irregularity in the conduct of the sale. A sale can be set aside if the Court were satisfied upon the facts proved in the case that there were circumstances from which reasonable inference could be drawn that the inadequacy in price was the result of the material irregularity, although mere inadequacy of price, without either direct evidence or proof of such circumstances as mentioned above, would not be sufficient to set aside the sale : 20 Mad 159 ; 20 Cal 1 and 31 Cal 815, Ref. [P 175 C 1, 2]

K. Rajah Ayyar — for Petitioner.

M. S. Venkatarama Iyer — for Respondents.

Order.—It has been conceded by Mr. Rajah Ayyar, the counsel for the petitioner, that there was no proclamation before the property, which happens to be one-eighth share in a village, was sold by public auction. Admittedly this is a material irregularity. It was not seriously contested that the price at which the property was sold was grossly inadequate. A firm offer was made by the objecting creditor in the lower Appellate Court to the extent of about double the price for which the property was knocked down at the auction sale. It was also admitted that the purchaser is a close relation of the judgment-debtor.

The only point which was seriously contested by the counsel for the petitioner was that the sale could not be set aside as the respondent had failed to prove that the inadequacy in price was caused by reason of such irregularity. At one point of time, there was a divergence of views between the High Court of Allahabad on the one hand and those of the High Courts of Madras and Calcutta on the other. The High Court of Allahabad was of opinion that the inadequacy in the sale price was not sufficient to set aside the sale in the absence of direct evidence which established a causal connexion between the material irregularity and the inadequacy of price fetched at the sale. It was on the contrary held by the High Court of Madras in 20 Mad 159[1] that the fact that the inadequacy of price fetched at the auction was the result of the material irregularity committed in conducting the sale might ordinarily give rise to an inference that the low price was a consequence of irregularity even though the manner in which the irregularity produced the low price be not definitely made out.

The High Court of Calcutta had taken a similar view in 30 Cal 1[2] and 31 Cal 815.[3] On account of this divergence of views, the Code of Civil Procedure had to be amended and the words "unless upon the facts proved the Court is satisfied" have been substituted to give effect to the decisions of the High Courts of Calcutta and Madras. It is no longer necessary to prove a causal connexion between the two by means of direct evidence; but a sale could be set aside if the Court were satisfied upon the facts proved in the case that there were circumstances from which a reasonable inference might be drawn that the inadequacy in price was the result of the material irregularity, although mere inadequacy of price, without either direct evidence or proof of such circumstances as mentioned above, would not be sufficient to set aside the sale.

In this case, material irregularity has been admitted and the inadequacy in price which the property fetched at the sale was not seriously contested. The fact that there was no proclamation might legitimately give rise to an inference that if the sale had been proclaimed, the intending purchasers might have been present to bid for the property which might have fetched a higher price in consequence. It was in any case open to the lower Appellate Court to draw this inference and having done so, it cannot be said that it exercised a jurisdiction which did not vest in it. It cannot therefore be questioned in revision. I would therefore dismiss the petition with costs.

 Presidency-Towns Insolvency Act (1909), Ss. 58 (5), 33 (4) — Obstruction by insolvent's agent in realizing insolvent's property—Contempt proceedings against agent cannot be taken.

Neither S. 58 (5) nor S. 33 (4) can be invoked to enable the Court to punish for contempt an agent of the insolvent, who at the instigation of the insolvent, obstructs the realization of the insolvent's property. [P 176 C 1]

Official Assignee in person.

A. C. Nataraja Aiyar—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This is an application arising out of the sale of a house which was the property of the insolvent. After the sale there was considerable trouble in getting the insolvent to quit the premises. He made a show of handing over the premises, but then, after the purchaser had got into possession of the upper storey, he with his family squatted in the lower storey. Contempt proceedings were taken against the insolvent who contended that the occupants of the lower storey of the house were not under his power, that his wife was out of his control and so on. That contention was negatived and he was committed to jail and the order was confirmed on appeal. He has served the period for which his detention was ordered, but his wife continues to squat in those premises.

I have no doubt as a matter of fact that the wife is acting under the instigation of her husband, the insolvent, though she denies that she has anything to do with her husband at present. But the question is whether this Court can evict the wife, the presumed agent of the insolvent, by taking contempt proceedings against her, the contempt proceedings against the insolvent himself having failed to achieve their object. There is no provision under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act enabling contempt proceedings against an agent, so far as I am aware, except S. 58, sub.s. (5), which is in terms restricted to a refusal of an agent to hand over money and securities belonging to the insolvent. This certainly cannot cover the persistence by an agent of the insolvent in obstructing the delivery of immovable property. The insolvent himself is punishable by contempt proceedings by virtue of the provisions of S. 33, sub.s. (4). I am very doubtful indeed whether that provision of law can be extended so as to enable the Court to punish for contempt an agent of an insolvent who at the instigation of the insolvent obstructs the realization of the insolvent's property. No doubt the Court can treat the insolvent as in contempt when he instigates an agent to do that which the law prohibits him from doing himself. Such action has already been taken in this case. It would to my mind be an undesirable and unwarranted extension of the powers given to the Court to take against the alleged agent contempt proceedings which the law only expressly warrants against the insolvent himself. In this view of the law I must dismiss the application. In the circumstances of the case I make no order as to costs.

Leach C. J.—The Sundara Shanmuga Vilas Prize Chit Fund, a company registered under the Companies Act, is being wound up in the Court of the District Judge of Chittoor as the result of a compulsory winding up order passed by this Court. This Court appointed three official liquidators who on taking over charge of the assets came to the conclusion that one asset, a decree in favour of the directors of the company, should be sold by auction, as it would be too expensive to undertake execution proceedings. They accordingly applied to the District Judge for directions under S. 183 of the Act and he ordered the decree to be sold by auction. In accordance with this order an auction was held on 1st November 1934 and the appellant bid Rs. 25. As there was no higher bid he was declared to be the purchaser. On 5th November 1934 the three liquidators executed a deed assigning the decree to the appellant who, on 17th January 1935, applied to be brought on the record and to have leave to execute the decree. Before he could take advantage of his purchase, one of the liquidators applied to the District Judge for directions in order to get the sale set aside. By an order dated 13th February 1936 the District Judge did set aside the sale as he considered that there were good grounds for thinking that the sale was not properly advertised, and on general grounds he thought that a doubtful asset should not be sold. It is from this order that the present appeal has been preferred.

It is clear that the learned District Judge had no power to set aside the sale. The decree was sold by auction and the appellant was the highest bidder. The appellant having become the purchaser, the official liquidators with the sanction of the Court assigned the decree to him. In these circumstances the Court had no right to set aside the contract. The principles of O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C., do not apply, but even if they did there would be no ground for setting aside the sale. It is not suggested that the appellant was a party to any fraud. The appellant having bought the decree is entitled to the benefit of it, and the order of the learned District Judge must therefore be set aside. Having succeeded, the appellant is entitled to costs which will be paid out of the assets of the Company.

Order. —The question to decide is whether the sale deed impeached amounts to a fraudulent preference under S. 54, Provincial Insolvency Act. The material dates are these. Respondent 2 was adjudicated insolvent on 30th November 1931 on a creditor's petition dated 8th August 1931. The insolvent had executed the sale deed in question on 27th July 1931 in favour of his nephew and son-in-law, respondent 1. On 9th July 1932 the application out of which this civil revision petition arises was made by the Official Receiver for the setting aside of the sale deed. The learned District Judge, reversing the decision of the trial Court, has held that the conveyance amounts to a fraudulent preference. Respondent 1, the transferee, questions the correctness of the District Judge's order.

There is practically no dispute about the facts which may be shortly stated. In 1922 respondent 2 was appointed guardian of respondent 1 under the Guardians and Wards Act. As the record shows, bonds of the value of about Rs. 7200 belonging to the ward were taken possession of by the guardian. On 22nd February 1931 respondent 1 who had by then attained majority applied to the Court for directions against his quondam guardian complaining that he had misappropriated the ward's funds and that proper accounts had not been rendered. Respondent 2 in his counter-affidavit dated 6th July admitted the breach of trust and after putting forward various excuses offered to convey his immovable property to get released from his obligation. The matter was apparently adjourned to enable respondent 2 to carry out his promise, and on 27th July, as already stated, the sale deed in question came into existence. The sale purports to be for Rs. 6000, respondent 2 having been given credit for some amounts which he alleged to have expended on his ward's behalf. The application was finally disposed of on 8th August when the Judge, after recording the settlement, dismissed the petition. On the same day, as already noted, the petition to adjudicate respondent 2 insolvent was filed.

On these facts the question arises, does the conveyance amount to a fraudulent preference under S. 54, Provincial Insolvency Act? Both the Courts concur in finding that there was a true pre-existing debt as alleged by the transferee. They concurrently find further that the property conveyed was not worth more than Rupees 6000, the consideration mentioned in the deed. That a petition imputing breach of trust to respondent 2 was then pending is common ground. Beyond these admitted facts respondent 1 swears that some ill-feeling had arisen between him and his former guardian, a circumstance to which the District Judge does not advert. True, when he moved the Court, respondent 1 was aware, as admitted by himself in his affidavit that respondent 2 was "on the brink of insolvency". These being the facts is the Judge's decision right? The test in such cases is what is the dominant or operative motive of the debtor in making the transfer. Is it a reasonable inference from the facts above mentioned that the dominant view which influenced respondent 2 was to prefer a particular creditor or is it more reasonable to hold that he acted with a view to protect himself from exposure or from any sort of proceedings? Respondent 1 was pressed to say in cross-examination : "As I was his son-in-law, respondent 2 wanted to pay me first."

The learned District Judge seizes upon this answer for the purpose of inferring that the transferor's object was to give the creditor a preference. He forgets that a debtor in giving a security to a particular creditor often acts from mixed motives. The very fact that S. 54 has been invoked shows that while one creditor has been benefited, there are others who as the result of the act impeached have been defeated or defrauded. The question is not whether several motives have not operated on the mind of the debtor but what among them was the dominant or effectual motive. If the debtor is influenced solely by one motive the case presents no difficulty whatsoever; but when the Court has to ascertain which of several motives is the operative or substantial motive, its task becomes difficult. In the present case there is on the one hand the desire on the part of the debtor to protect himself; there may be, on the other, in view of the admission referred to above, some desire to benefit his own near relative. In a case like the present it is natural if not inevitable, that the debtor has present to his mind, as one view among several, the giving of a preference to the particular creditor benefited; that could hardly be decisive of the matter. It would suffice to refer to the following cases where this question was considered by me in its different aspects : 49 M L J 562,[1] A I R 1932 Mad 459,[2] 41 M L W 358[3] and 68 M L J 57.[4] In addition it may be useful to quote here the words of Bowen L. J.:

> It is an exceedingly difficult thing (it is possible no doubt for juries may have to do it) to arrive at an opinion as to what is the dominant or operative motive of a man in doing a particular act. But if we are to consider whether amongst all the shadows which pass across a man's mind, some view as well as the dominant view influenced him to do the act, we shall be embarking on a dark and unknown voyage across an exceedingly misty sea. It is a very difficult matter to prove that the dominant motive was the sole motive, and I think that the true test under S. 92 is this: (1) had the debtor a view of giving a preference to the creditor, and (2) was that the operative effectual view : (1883) 23 Ch D 695.[5]

Applying this test, I can have no hesitation in holding that the lower Appellate Court's decision is wrong and it is accordingly set aside and the petition is allowed with costs throughout.

Pandrang Row J.—This suit relates to the genuineness of a will alleged to have been executed by one Arumandla Byragi on 17th September 1926. The plaintiffs instituted the suit as the nearest reversioners of the deceased testator in 1928 impleading the widow. The suit was not tried on the merits, though it was pending from 1928 to 1932 when an additional written statement was put in contending that by reason of subsequent legislation, viz. Act 2 of 1929, the plaintiffs ceased to be the nearest reversioners, the order of succession having been altered by that Act, and that the suit ceased to be maintainable, as the sister's sons of the deceased had become nearer reversioners and had not been brought on record. An application which was made to bring the sister's sons on record was dismissed by the lower Court which at the same time dismissed the suit altogether on the ground that the suit was not maintainable as it stood. It would appear that an application by the plaintiffs to amend the plaint by adding a new allegation of fraud between the sister's sons and the widow was also dismissed. The present appeal is an appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge dated 15th March 1932, dismissing the suit. It might be necessary to state in this connexion that a separate suit, which was instituted by the sister's sons for a similar declaration, namely that the will was not genuine, was ultimately dismissed on the ground that Act 2 of 1929 did not have any retrospective effect and did not make them the nearest reversioners to the deceased. We have thus both the suits for a declaration in respect of the same will dismissed without any trial on the merits, the reasons given for the dismissal of the two suits being contradictory.

The main question for us to decide in this appeal is whether in the circumstances of the present case the plaintiffs-appellants should not be given an opportunity of continuing the suit with such amendments as may be necessary after making the sister's sons party defendants. There can be no doubt that in the interests of justice the Courts have ample power to allow amendment and to allow fresh parties to be joined. This cannot be and is not questioned. It is however contended that certain observations of the Judicial Committee in 6 Cal 764,[1] particularly those at p. 772, preclude us from allowing the plaintiffs to continue their suit when at the present moment they are no longer the nearest reversioners by reason of Act 2 of 1929 which was enacted during the pendency of the suit in the Court below. It is not possible in our opinion to say that their Lordships in 6 Cal 764[1] contemplated a contingency of this kind, namely where a suit, which was properly instituted by the nearest reversioners, becomes by virtue of legislation during the pendency of the suit, a suit by remote reversioners. This unusual contingency does not appear to have been contemplated and it cannot be said that the observations in 6 Cal 764[1] really prevent the Court from allowing the continuance of the suit in the circumstances mentioned above. Similar cases have come before Courts and in two cases which were decided by Benches of our own High Court, namely 1936 M W N 1111[2] and (1937) 2 M L J 209,[3] it has been held that the plaintiffs in these circumstances should be allowed to continue the suit after making the nearest reversioners parties to the suit and after such amendment of the plaint as may be necessary. There are no doubt one or two decisions of other High Courts contra. One of them, 13 Lah 178,[4] does not discuss the question ; another is by a single Judge ; and the third no doubt takes the view that in no case other than the cases mentioned in 6 Cal 764[1] could a remote reversioner maintain a suit. After considering the question fully in the light of the decisions, we are of opinion that there is no reason why we should not follow the decisions of our own High Court, and all the more so in view of the nature of the suit and the observations made as regards the character of such suits in the Full Bench decision in 29 Mad 390[5] at p. 402, namely :

> The true purpose of the concession of a right of suit in all these cases is the protection of the interest of the person or persons who may eventually turn out to be the heir or heirs, and the object of the legal proceeding is really the perpetuation of testimony which, owing to lapse of time, might not be available for the heir when the succession actually opens. Now as it is not possible either to determine beforehand who will be the actual successor or to predicate the existence of any substantial distinction between the right of one reversioner and that of another, in theory it would seem that the right to take legal proceedings for perpetuation of testimony should be conceded to each and all of such persons.

The purpose for which Courts permit declaratory suits by reversioners in cases like the present can be served only if the present suit is allowed to be continued, because in the circumstances of the present case, if this is not permitted, there will be no chance even for the nearest reversioner to question at present the validity or genuineness of the will, and that question will have to be postponed till the death of the widow which might happen many years hence when it would be difficult to expect oral testimony to be available on the subject. Looking to the purpose in view, and also of the peculiar circumstances of this case, namely that by an Act of the Legislature the persons who had a right to maintain the suit have been deprived of the particular character in virtue of which he was entitled as a matter of right to bring the suit, we consider that the ends of justice will be served best by permitting the plaintiffs to amend their plaint and make the nearest reversioners party defendants and prosecute the suit further in the Court below.

The appeal is accordingly allowed and the decree of the Court below dismissing the suit set aside. The suit is remanded to the lower Court for disposal according to law after allowing the plaintiffs one month's time after the receipt of the records in the Court below to apply to amend their plaint and to make the nearest reversioners party defendants. In the circumstances of the case there will be no order as to costs of this appeal. The costs of the lower Court will be provided for in the revised decree of the Court below. The plaintiffs-appellants are entitled to get a refund of the court-fee paid by them on the memorandum of appeal.

Secretary of State — Appellant.

Kattari Nagayya Kama Rajendra Ramaswami Kamya Naicker Zamindar of Saptur—Respondent.

Appeal No. 166 of 1930, Decided on 30th April 1936, against decree of Sub-Judge (Second Addl.), Madura, in O. S. No. 73 of 1926.

(a) Easement — Riparian rights — Right of upper riparian owner to divert water to tank situate at long distance is in nature of easement and not riparian right.

Where the upper riparian owner seeks to use the water of the river not for the riparian tenement but to fill a tank situated at a long distance, the right to divert water to such a tank by putting up a permanent dam across the river is one in the nature of an easement and is not a riparian right. The lower riparian owner is therefore entitled to insist that there should be no excessive user and that the easement should be enjoyed in manner consistent with his rights and without increasing the burden of the easement : 32 Mad 141, Rel. on. [P 182 C 2]

(b) Riparian Rights—Obstruction—Acquisition of prescriptive right to maintain dam—Party does not obtain immunity in respect of all other obstructions naturally arising owing to existence of dam — Obstruction by accumulation of silt amounts to nuisance—Remedy of person injured thereby stated.

Even when a party acquires the right by prescription to maintain a dam, it does not obtain a kind of immunity in respect of all other obstructions that may arise in the natural course of things by reason of the existence of the dam. The obstruction caused to the free flow of water in the stream by accumulation of silt owing to existence of dam, amounts to a "nuisance" and the riparian owner who is injured thereby may take steps to abate it even by going on the other person's land, if only he can do it peacefully. If this is not permitted, his remedy is to sue for an injunction and for damages. [P 183 C 1, 2]

(c) Limitation Act (1908), S. 23—"Continuing wrong"—Obstruction to water by accumulation of silt due to construction of dam—Injury to lower riparian owner is continuous.

The injury caused to the lower riparian owner by obstructions due to the accumulation of silt owing to the construction of a dam may well be regarded as a "continuing wrong" within the meaning of S. 23 and he will have a cause of action accruing de die in deiem, until the opposing party acquires a prescriptive right to maintain the obstruction : 6 Cal 394, Rel. on. [P 183 C 2; P 184 C 1]

(d) Easements Act (1882), S. 17—Prescriptive right in respect of silt accumulation (Quaere).

It is doubtful whether a prescriptive right can be acquired at all in respect of a shifting or changing mass like silt accumulation: (1895) A C 1, Ref. [P 184 C 1]

 (e) Riparian Rights—Upper proprietor's rights—Acquisition of prescriptive right to maintain dam — Owner can still use such water only as he was accustomed to—He cannot enlarge dimensions of channel.

The acquisition by the upper riparian owner of a prescriptive right to maintain a dam in a stream will not of itself entitle him to all the waters intercepted by the dam but only to such water as he had been accustomed to take by the channel previously. If he is entitled to draw water through a channel with certain dimensions, he cannot enlarge the dimensions of that channel : (1906) A C 72 and (1747) 1 Wilson K B 174, Rel. on. [P 184 C 2; P 185 C 1]

Govt. Pleader (K. S. Krishnaswamy Iyengar) and K. S. Champakesa Iyengar — for Appellant.

K. V. Krishnaswamy Iyer, M. A. Krishnaswamy Iyer and R. Ramasubbu Iyer — for Respondent.

Varadachariar J. — As the introductory facts have been set out in our judgment in A. S. No. 165 of 1930, it is sufficient to state here that this appeal arises out of disputes between the Government and the zamindar of Saptur in respect of silt clearance near and over the Vannapparai anicut and of the extent of the Government's right to take water through the Sivaneri channel, which branches off from the Periyar in front of this anicut. At this point, the river has a bend and flows more or less south to north. The anicut has been constructed south-west to north-east and the channel takes off from the right or eastern bank of the river. In the plaint, the zamindar who is a lower riparian owner complained of two matters: (i) that the Government through its servants and ryots of the Ayan villages had widened and deepened the Sivaneri channel from time to time thus obstructing more water from the river, and (ii) that the river has silted up on both sides above the anicut and reeds, etc., have grown, with the result that water passes only over a small portion of the anicut. Two reliefs were accordingly prayed for: prayer (a) related to the clearance of silt and removal of the reeds, etc; prayer (b) asked for the restoration of the channel to a width of six yards with the bed level at half a foot above the crest of the Vannapparai dam. Prayer (c) may be left alone as it merely suggested a method by which the relief asked for in prayer (b) might be carried out.

The written statement denied that there had been any widening or deepening of the channel after 1876. This particular year was mentioned because it was with reference to that date that the High Court had decided in A. S. 31 of 1883 that the Government had not been shown to have changed the depth, width or position of the channel. No figures were given in the written statement as to the dimensions, etc. of the channel, but the Government took care not to admit the correctness of the allegations in the plaint as to the dimensions of the channel or its bed level. As regards the silting, Government said that "no act of the defendant contributed to the silting up, if any, or to the growth of the reeds"; it was added:

Whatever earth or brushwood may be found is on the natural banks of the river near the anicut and exists for the safety and protection of the adjoining lands.

The Government also raised a plea of limitation founded on the continuance to the knowledge of the plaintiff and his predecessors-in-title of the present state of things in assertion of a hostile title by the defendant for over half a century.

Of the issues framed in the case it is sufficient to mention Issue (2) relating to the width and bed level of the channel, Issue (4) relating to the silting up of the river and obstruction by growth of brushwood and Issue (6) raising the plea of limitation. Issue (9) was the general issue as to the relief to be given to the plaintiff. The trial Court held that the suit was not barred by limitation. Under Issue (4) it found that the river had become silted up and obstructed and accordingly gave certain directions in respect of the removal of the silt and reeds. Under Issue (2) it accepted as correct the figures given in the commissioner's report and plan [Exs. 63 and 63 (a)] as to the width of the channel and fixed the bed level at the head as two feet below the crest of the Vannapparai anicut. During the pendency of the suit in the lower Court, certain works alleged to be by way of clearance of sand at the mouth of the channel had been executed by the Government and certain interlocutory proceedings had taken place with reference to the same. Adverting to the terms of the High Court's order made in that connexion, the learned Subordinate Judge also directed the defendant to restore the status quo ante as per the detailed provisions contained in para. (3) of the decree. Against the decree, in so far as it is against the defendant, Government has preferred the appeal. The plaintiff has filed a memorandum of objections claiming that all the reliefs asked for in the plaint should have been granted.

It will be convenient at the outset to deal with an argument as to onus of proof advanced on behalf of the appellant. The plaint alleged that by reason of the state of things therein described, the supply of water to the plaintiff's tanks was greatly diminished, that the plaintiff's ryots suffered thereby and that in consequence thereof plaintiff suffered damage to the extent of Rs. 440 in Faslis 1329 to 1331. The written statement denied that there had been any diminution in the supply of water flowing over the anicut and passing to the plaintiff's tank. It also denied that the plaintiff had sustained any damage. It suggested that, on the other hand, by reason of what the zamindar had been doing further east on the river (at the point A), his tanks were receiving a much larger supply of water than before and that the cultivation under them had been greatly extended. This is the matter in dispute in the connected suit. On the issue as to damages framed in this case, the lower Court found that the zamindar had not proved that he "has suffered damages as a result of any specific act of the defendant." Taking his stand on this finding, the learned advocate for the appellant has contended that in the absence of proof of damage, the plaintiff was not entitled to any of the reliefs claimed in the suit. He maintained this proposition even on the footing that the suit was to be regarded as one between two riparian proprietors. But at the end of his argument he also made reference to the prerogative of the State in India to distribute the waters of public streams in any manner it liked and contended that in this view at least the onus must be laid on the plaintiff to prove damage. The decision in 32 Mad 141,[1] on which he relied, is itself sufficient authority against the first contention, because the Government, as upper riparian owner, is not seeking to use the water of the river for a riparian tenement but to fill a tank situate at a long distance. Further, the right to divert water to such a tank by putting up a permanent dam across the river is one in the nature of an easement and is not a riparian right. The lower riparian owner is therefore entitled to insist that there should be no excessive user and that the easement should be enjoyed in a manner consistent with his rights and without increasing the burden of the easement. As the Government claims the easement by prescription, the lower Court rightly held that it is for the defendant to show the extent of his prescriptive right. The existence of the dam is not in dispute nor its dimensions. But on proof that the silt has accumulated near or over it in a way calculated to obstruct the normal flow of water over the dam, the plaintiff is entitled to relief unless Government can show that the plaintiff's remedy in respect thereof has become barred by limitation. As regards the dimensions of the channel, it is the plaintiff who complains that they have been interfered with by the Government and the lower Court was therefore right in throwing upon him the burden of proving that fact. By an application of the presumption against wrong doing, the Court started with a presumption in favour of the existing state of things and called upon the zamindar to prove that it is different from the original or lawful condition.

Should the question of onus however be considered from the point of view of prerogative of the State, the decision in 32 Mad 141[1] no doubt lends support to the appellant's contention that even in circumstances like those of the present case, the onus is on the plaintiff to show that he has sustained damage. The learned Judges however did not base their decisions on that ground because they found that even placing the onus on the defendant, the evidence established that the plaintiff in that suit had not sustained damage. We are however unable to accede to the contention that the present case should be determined with reference to the prerogative of the State. The written statement makes no reference to this aspect and it has not been suggested that anything is now being done by the Government in pursuance of any project or contemplated irrigation work. Both parties dealt with the case on the footing that it was one intended to determine the extent of the existing rights of the zamindar on the one hand and the Ayan ryots served by the Sivaneri channel on the other. It does not seem to us fair at this stage to convert the defence into one based on the Government's prerogative right. The finding recorded by the lower Court on the question of damages is carefully worded. The judgment undoubtedly proceeds on the footing that the accumulation of silt, etc. near and over the anicut has diminished the supply of water flowing over the dam, but it nevertheless found against the plaintiff on the question of damages because the damage, if any, was not shown to be attributable to any act of the Government. We may also point out that, so far as the plaintiff complains of the obstruction caused by the accumulation of silt, it is difficult to see where any question of prerogative right of distribution of water comes in. On the other hand, if driven to it, we feel constrained to say that the correspondence discloses an unreasonable attitude on the part of some of the local officers concerned in rejecting even modest proposals made from time to time by equally responsible officers, though for the time being the latter happened to be in charge of the estate under the Court of Wards.

It was also contended on behalf of the appellant that as the accumulation of silt has been found to be due to natural causes, and the allegations in the plaint attributing the same to the acts of Government officers have not been proved, the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief. This argument ignores the effect of the evidence (including that of P. W. 13, an officer of the Government) showing that the accumulation is caused by the existence of the anicut which has been constructed by the Government for the benefit of the Sivaneri channel. The authorities establish that the obstruction caused to the free flow of water in the stream by such accumulation amounts to a "nuisance" and that the riparian owner who is injured thereby may take steps to abate it even by going on the other person's land, if only he can do it peacefully. If this is not permitted, his remedy is to sue for an injunction and for damages : see Coulson and Forbes on Waters, 5th Edn. pp. 667 and 668; Angell on Watercourses, paras. 388 and 389; Gould on Waters, para. 363. The observations in para. 445 of Farnham on Waters show that the position is the same even when natural causes combine with the existence of the dam to bring about the obstruction. We cannot accept the appellants' contention that once Government acquires the right by prescription to maintain the dam, it also obtains a kind of immunity in respect of all other obstructions that may arise in the natural course of things by reason of the existence of the dam.

It was next contended that plaintiff's remedy if any in respect of the clearance of the silt had become barred by limitation. It must be mentioned here that though there is a reference in para. 15 of the written statement to the plea of limitation, it would rather seem to refer to the state of the channel than to the accumulated silt in the river. The written statement carefully avoids making any admission as to the silt accumulation, as shown by the use of the expression "if any" in para. 10. In any event, the defendant puts forward no specific or definite case as to the time during which there has been accumulation of silt at any particular spot. Appellants' learned counsel relied on the fact, appearing from Exs. H series and N. series, that from time to time over a period of nearly forty years before suit, the plaintiff's officers have been complaining to the defendant's officers about silt accumulation in the suit locality and have been asking for its removal, while the defendant's officers have uniformly declined to allow it to be done. But the evidence in the case, including that of P. W. 13, establishes what might even otherwise be safely presumed, that in this jungle stream the silt appears at one season and disappears by the action of the floods in another season and its re-appearance in another year may well be on different spot. P. W. 13, who examined the locality under instructions from the Government just before he gave evidence, has prepared a sketch (Ex. SSS) wherein he shows, to the south of the dam, a mass of obstructing material which he describes as "shifting low sand shoal now a little above anicut crest." This practically corresponds to what is shown in the commissioner's plan Ex. 63 (a), as A.7, A.8, A.9, C.2, C.3, C.8, C.4 and is described in para. 10 (c) of his report (Ex. 63) as "silted up by sand in uneven level". It is difficult to see how there can arise any plea of limitation in respect of the removal of such obstruction. The injury caused to the lower riparian owner by obstructions of this kind may well be regarded as a "continuing wrong" within the meaning of S. 23 and he will have a cause of action accruing de die in deiem, see 6 Cal 394[2] at pp. 404, 405 (and S. 24 of Act 9 of 1871 with its Illustration), until the opposing party acquires a prescriptive right to maintain the obstruction. As stated already, the Government has no specific case in respect of this silt accumulation. There is accordingly no question of any acquisition of prescriptive right in respect thereof. It is indeed doubtful whether a prescriptive right could be acquired at all in respect of a shifting or changing mass like silt accumulation : see (1895) A C 1[3] at p. 6.

It was sought to be maintained by reference to the sketch N.3, that the accumulation on the left flank of the river indicated by the letters "abc" on that sketch must have continued to exist at that definite spot and in that definite form for a sufficiently long time so as to give rise to a prescriptive right. One answer to this argument is that no such case has been put forward in the written statement. In N.3, which is dated 1894, it is indicated that this silt bank is overgrown with shrubs. There is nothing to show the length of time during which or up to which it existed. Between 1894 and 1896 the estate officers were pressing for the removal of silt, but in N.20 dated 16th September 1896 it is stated by the Deputy Collector, as reported by the Manager, "that the silts have been cleared by nature during the late freshes in river". In subsequent correspondence, till we come to 1917, no reference is found to silt accumulation or its removal. We are therefore unable to hold that the silt accumulation shown in N.3 has permanently remained there in any definite form. In Ex. SSS, P. W. 13 has shown in the same locality an accumulation which he has described in the following words: "portion referred to as silt bank formed by river deposit, with vegetation, reeds, after the anicut was built". No question was put to him in chief examination about this except to elicit that the silt bank acts as a buffer to the natural bank by increasing the breadth of ground through which the water will have to cut (para. 25 of the deposition).

In cross-examination the witness explained how in his opinion the silt bank comes to be formed on the left flank (para. 58) and added in para. 59 "from the vegetation on the silt banks, I shall say that they are a few years old." Nothing further was elicited from him in re-examination as to what he meant by saying "a few years". On the other hand, the suggestion of Government as appears from the cross-examination of D. W. 1 (on p. 677 of the record) was that these "are not silt banks but natural high grounds". D. W. 1 emphatically repudiated that suggestion and P. W. 13 agreed with equal emphasis that it was silt accumulation and not natural high ground. There is also the fact (noted by the lower Court) that in respect of any cause of action that accrued to the plaintiff subsequent to 1906, no plea of limitation can affect the plaintiff's remedy because of the minority of the plaintiff and his elder brother who died a minor. We accordingly hold that there is no force in the plea of limitation so far as the claim for the removal of the silt is concerned.

We see no other tenable objection to the direction in para. (1) of the lower Court's decree. The question whether from an engineering point of view the removal of the silt is desirable or undesirable seems to have been considered by the officers of Government almost wholly with reference to the interests of the Ayan ryots. Such considerations seem to us irrelevant to the case, though even on the aspect of "safety" to the dam, the evidence does not make out that the direction given by the lower Court will in any way endanger it.

Proceeding next to the objections to Cl. (2) of the lower Court's decree, we may state at the outset that the acquisition by the defendant of a prescriptive right to maintain the dam will not of itself entitle him to all the waters intercepted by the dam but only to such water as he has been accustomed to take by the Sivaneri

(Their Lordships after considering the oral and documentary evidence in the case concluded as follows.) Except to the extent of the variation above made in respect of the depth of the channel, the decree of the Court below is confirmed and the appeal and the memorandum of objections are dismissed. Second Appeal No. 138 of 1936, Decided on 1st March 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Vellore, in A. S. No. 97 of 1935.

(a) Partnership Act (1932), S. 74 — Retrospective effect.

The operation of S. 74 is not confined only to suits and proceedings which were pending at the commencement of the Partnership Act as the section does not say so in express terms : A I R 1934 Cal 754 and A I R 1935 Lah 893, Dissent. [P 186 C 1]

(b) Partnership Act (1932), Ss. 69 and 74— Right of action accruing before passing of Act — Suit instituted after passing of Act — S. 69 does not affect right but alters procedure which must be followed.

The right of action, which has accrued to the firm before the passing of the Partnership Act, is not affected by S. 69. The firm still has the same right as it had before the passing of the Act. What has been altered is the mode in which the firm can enforce that right and now before filing a suit the firm has to get itself registered and that is a matter of alteration in procedure. The procedure under S. 69 must therefore be followed in suit instituted after 1st October 1933 : A I R 1936 All 3; A I R 1934 Cal 754 and A I R 1937 Mad 419, Rel. on; 6 M H C R 122 and A I R 1920 Cal 435, Disting. [P 186 C 2]

(c) Partnership Act (1932), S. 69 — Suit instituted contrary to provisions of S. 69 cannot be validated by subsequent compliance.

Section 69 must be strictly construed and the suit instituted contrary to its provisions is bad and cannot be subsequently validated by compliance with those provisions : A I R 1936 Mad 24, Disting. [P 188 C 2]

Judgment.—The appeal is by the plaintiff. The plaintiff is a firm and the suit was against a debtor of the firm to recover money due on dealings. The suit was filed on 12th October 1933, i. e. it was presented into Court on that day; and it was admitted to the file on 20th November 1933. The Partnership Act 9 of 1932 came into force on 1st October 1932, except S. 69 which came into force according to S. 1 (3) of the Act on 1st October 1933. And the question for decision in this suit is whether, having regard to the provisions of S. 69, the suit is maintainable. S. 69 (2) is :

> No suit to enforce a right arising from a contract shall be instituted in any Court by or on behalf of a firm against any third party unless the firm is registered and the persons suing are or have been shown in the register of firms as partners in the firm.

This suit was instituted after 1st October 1933, and the trial Court and the Court of first appeal have both held that it is not maintainable, because the plaintiff firm was not registered on 12th October 1933. Another point that arises in the suit is this. The plaintiff firm did actually get itself registered on 15th January 1934; and it is contended that the lower Courts were wrong in not holding that the suit could be treated as valid as from that date. Two arguments have been put forward on appeal. The first is that the right to bring a suit without being registered as a firm to recover this debt was a right which had vested before the passing of Act 9 of 1932, and so is not affected by the provisions of that Act. That is the argument founded on general principle : and it is also contended that S. 74 of the Act confirms this principle. The second argument relates to the further point which I have just mentioned, namely that the lower Courts should have treated the suit as valid as from the date when the firm became registered. The relevant words of S. 74 are as follows :

> Nothing in this Act shall affect or be deemed to affect : (a) any right, title, interest, obligation or liability already acquired, accrued or incurred before the commencement of this Act; or (b) any legal proceeding or remedy in respect of any such right.

Before examining the principal argument in the appeal which is briefly that S. 74 merely enunciates the general principle that new enactments cannot retrospectively affect vested rights unless by express provision in the enactments themselves, I would observe that the legal proceedings indicated in S. 74 (b) have been interpreted in some decisions to mean proceedings pending at the commencement of the Act, and it is argued as a preliminary point that that interpretation is not correct. With all respect to the learned Judges who decided those cases, namely 62 Cal 213,[1] and A I R 1935 Lah 893,[2] I must say that I find myself in agreement with the learned Government Pleader, who appears for the appellants, on this point. There appears to be no reason why, if the Legislature intended to confine the operation of S. 74 only to suits and proceedings which were pending at the time of the commencement of the Act, they should not have said so in express terms. One finds such provisions in other enactments. On the main point however, namely that S. 69 either by the general law or by reason of the operation of S. 74 has no retrospective effect, I find myself unable to agree with the learned counsel for the appellant. The argument, as I have said, is that the firm, prior to the passing of the Act, had the right to sue for debt without being registered, that right was a vested right which cannot be taken away by the Act, and therefore since the cause of action accrued before the Act, the plaintiff firm can bring exactly the same kind of suit as it could before the Act, i. e. without first getting itself registered under Ch. 7 of the Act. In my opinion the only right which is affected by S. 69 is a processual right. Before the Act, the firm had acquired rights under its contract with defendant. Those rights are not affected or impaired by the passing of the Act. Before the Act, the firm could have brought a suit against the defendant to enforce that contract. The right to bring a suit is not impaired by the passing of the Act. So far as I can see, the only difference is that prior to bringing the suit the plaintiff firm must now do a certain act, namely get itself registered in the office of the Registrar of firms, and I think that is a processual matter.

Therefore though the general principle relied upon by the learned Government Pleader cannot be gainsaid, and while it cannot be denied that it applies to protect all vested rights from the retrospective effect of new enactments, this in my opinion is the exception, namely where the right relates to procedure in which the litigant has not got a vested right. I cannot however omit to set out the argument in its strongest form, which has now been put forward on behalf of the appellant, namely that the right indicated in S. 74 (a) is a right of action, and if S. 69 can be construed as affecting the right of action, which the plaintiff firm had before the Act, that section is nullified by S. 74. I have given that argument my careful consideration, and I feel that the right of action in this case is not affected as such by S. 69. The plaintiff firm has still got that right, the same right as it had before the Act was passed. What has been altered is the mode in which the firm can enforce that right. Formerly it had only to file a suit into Court. Now before filing a suit the firm has to get itself registered, and that as I have said, is a matter of alteration in procedure which the law is perfectly competent to effect. This is the view of the section taken in the Allahabad High Court in 58 All 495[3] at page 499.

My attention has been drawn to several decisions in India in which the general principle has been affirmed. The first of these is 6 M H C R 122.[4] That was a case where the landlord sued to recover arrears of rent. The suit was instituted in April 1869 and included arrears which were due for 1865.66 before the passing of Act 8 of 1865. That Act governed the relations between landlord and tenant at the time of the suit, and according to S. 7 of that Act, no suit to enforce the terms of a tenancy could be maintained unless pattas and muchilikas had been exchanged. The defendant in the Madras High Court Reports Suit[4] contended that so far as rent due for 1865.66 was concerned, the suit was unsustainable, since patta and muchilika had not been exchanged. The fact however was that at the time when the arrears accrued, the Act had not come into force, and it was not necessary in order to enforce the recovery of those arrears that patta and muchilika should have been exchanged; and it was held in that case that S. 7 of the Act had no retrospective effect.

The exchange of patta and muchilika of course had nothing to do with the procedure by which the law was put into motion. The procedure was, as everybody knows, by instituting a suit in the Court of the Collector. The right to recover arrears even though no patta and muchilika had been exchanged was a vested right prior to the passing of the Act. Another important case cited in this connexion was 47 Cal 1108.[5] That case arose out of a difference between S. 66 of the present Civil Procedure Code and the corresponding S. 317 of the Code of 1882. The latter barred suits by the real owner only against the benami purchaser at Court auction of property sold under a decree, but not against the purchaser's assignees. The new S. 66 barred suit by the real owner against any person claiming title by virtue of the Court auction-purchase. The suit related to a Court auction-purchase which was confirmed on 30th July 1906, but in which the sale certificate was not taken out till 24th April 1909. The suit was filed after 1909 when the present Code of Civil Procedure had come into force. It was held that the rights of the parties were governed by S. 317 of the old Act, in other words S. 66 of the new Act could not operate to take away the right which had been vested before the commencement of that Act. In this case therefore the vested right was a substantive right. The new Code took it away absolutely. It was not a case where the new Code merely effected an alteration in the mode of enforcing that right.

In (1864) 10 H L C 704[6] the principal point for decision was whether the Barons of the Court of Exchequer had the delegated power under S. 26 of 22 and 23 Victoria, Chapter 21, to extend certain provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, to the Revenue Side of the Court of Exchequer. One of the results of such extension was to create a right of appeal to the Court of Exchequer Chamber from the verdict of the Court of Exchequer. The point was decided in the negative. It was held that the Barons had no such power under the aforesaid section of 22 and 23 Victoria, Chapter 21. But two of the learned Lords who decided that case held the opposite view, and they proceeded to consider the further point whether this alteration in the law could affect pending actions. That point was very pertinent to the case, because the respondents had obtained a verdict in the Court of Exchequer before the Barons of the Exchequer made the rule aforesaid and claimed that the new rule could not operate retrospectively so as to give appellant the right of appeal. Concerning the question whether the new rules affected pending actions, Lord Wensleydale said (page 762 of the report) :

A question has been presented to our attention which must be now considered—Was it competent for the Judges of the Exchequer to alter the law as to then pending proceedings, and to enact provisions at the time . . . . so as to affect the verdict, which the claimant then had, which was subject only to the then existing law, and make it subject to another mode of enquiry ? I was much impressed with this objection at first, and was for a time strongly inclined to think that it was well founded, and that the new rules, though operative as to all future suits, were not operative in this. But further argument, and a full consideration of this question, have satisfied me that this objection is not well-founded. (Page 763). . . . I think that if it were an alteration in the mode of proceeding only, to the prejudice of the claimants, the objection would not prevail. . . . . It is clear that there is a material difference when an Act of Parliament is dealing with a right of action already vested, not intended to be taken away; and when it is dealing with mere procedure to recover those rights, which it may be quite reasonable to regulate and alter. (Page 764). The right of the suitor is to bring the action, and to have it conducted in the way and according to the practice of the Court in which he brings it; and if any Act of Parliament, or any rule founded on the authority of the Act of Parliament, alters the mode of procedure, then he has a right to have it conducted in that altered mode. That therefore takes away nothing. The right of action does not constitute a title to keep all the consequences of the right as they were before. It gives the right to have the action conducted according to the rules then in force with respect to procedure. I am therefore clearly of opinion, that if the provisions of the rule had been in an Act of Parliament of the same date, the Act would have affected existing suits, and would unquestionably have given an appeal in suits in which verdicts were already obtained.

I may add that in the case already cited, 62 Cal 213,[1] it is held that S. 69 is operative not to affect an existing right, but merely to make an alteration of procedure to enforce that right. Though as I have said I do not find myself in agreement with the construction of S. 74 adopted by the learned Judges in that case, their interpretation of S. 69 is in my view, if I may say so with respect, a correct one. The same conclusion has been reached in recent cases of this Court. The case in 45 M L W 276[7] is one instance.

I now come to the second argument which has been raised in the appeal, and that is, that although the suit may have been bad at the time of the institution, the Courts below should have held that it was good from the date when the firm got itself registered. In support of this argument the case reported at 69 M L J 791[8] is cited. That was a case where the plaintiff having applied to be allowed to sue as a pauper and his application having been refused subsequently instituted a suit in the ordinary manner. But he did so without first paying the costs of the pauper petition to the defendant. The suit was accordingly dismissed, though prior to the dismissal of the suit he had deposited the costs in question. It was held by this Court on the appeal of the plaintiff that the Court below need not have dismissed the suit altogether, that it was unnecessary to go through the formality of a dismissal and re-institution the next moment after payment of the costs of the pauper application. The words of O. 33, R. 15 are "the applicant shall be at liberty to institute a suit in the ordinary manner provided that he first pays costs", etc., and these words in my opinion have the same effect as S. 69 (2), Partnership Act, which is that no suit to enforce a right shall be instituted unless the firm is registered. O. 33, R. 15 might read "no suit shall be instituted by the applicant unless the costs of the pauper petition are first paid". On the analogy therefore of this decision in 69 M L J 791[8] it is contended by the learned Government Pleader that the appellant's suit should not have been dismissed but should have been regarded as instituted on the date when the firm was registered which was 15th January 1934; and in support of this argument it is pointed out that the defendant in the suit was not aggrieved by the delay or default in getting the firm registered, because he raised no objection to the progress of the suit while the trial was going on, but only at the stage of argument did he disclose the fact to the Court that the suit had been filed at a time when the firm was not registered.

In my opinion the circumstances of this case are different from those in 69 M L J 791.[8] The circumstances of the two cases would be similar if in the present case the plaintiff firm had come to Court on 15th January 1934 and asked to be allowed to withdraw his suit on the ground that it was incompetent and to file another immediately. It was not until a year later that the Court in the present case was informed that the suit as filed was incompetent. The defendant in the ordinary course must be taken to have assumed when the suit was filed that the plaintiff firm was a registered firm and that it was registered under the style and title found in the plaint. But when in March 1935 after the trial was over, the defendant discovered that the suit firm had not been registered at the time of the plaint, then only was he in a position to ascertain the real identity of the plaintiff by consulting the certificate of registration. I do not say that he was actually prejudiced in the present case; but certainly cases can be imagined in which the certificate of registration might disclose some change in the nature of the firm which would support possible defence against the claim. On the whole therefore I am inclined to interpret S. 69 strictly and to hold that the suit instituted contrary to its provisions is bad and cannot be subsequently validated by compliance with those provisions. In the result this second appeal is dismissed with costs. Leave to appeal is requested and it is granted.

Civil Misc. Petn. No. 1745 of 1937, for a writ of certiorari, Decided on 13th July 1937.

Madras Local Boards Act (14 of 1920), S. 199 (c), R. 35 (2)—Government can stay proceedings at any time before result is declared—Election Commissioner can enquire only after declaration of results.

Under R. 35 (2) the "election proceedings" continue right till the results are declared and it is competent for the Government to stay them at any time before that. The jurisdiction of the Election Commissioner to enquire commences only when the results are declared. Thus where the polling at only one booth is stopped by the polling officer under R. 24-B (1) and the Government on enquiry conclude that there has been systematic interruption of the polling at all the polling booths and fix a date for the fresh poll, the order of the Government is not ultra vires. The Election Commissioner cannot interfere unless the order of the Government is ultra vires of the election rules or mala fide. Nor has the Election Court any jurisdiction to consider whether the order of a fresh election was justified or not justified on the facts. [P 189 C 2 ; P 190 C 1]

Order. — This matter relates to the election of a member to the District Board of Ramnad for the Pallathur Circle. The election was first fixed for 23rd November 1936. On that date, the poll at one of the fourteen polling booths was stopped by the Polling Officer under R. 24-B (1) of the Election Rules. The Election Authority, on being notified of this, referred the matter for the orders of Government. Government passed orders on 3rd December for the holding of a fresh poll at all the polling booths, stating it to be their conclusion after enquiring that there had been systematic interruption of the polling at all the polling stations. The date for this fresh poll was fixed by the Election Authority as 14th December. On that day polling proceeded normally, and in due course Mr. Venkatachalam Chettiar (the present petitioner) was declared elected. The defeated candidate, Mr. Nagappa Chettiar (the present respondent) thereupon filed a petition before the Election Commissioner (Principal Subordinate Judge, Madura) who held that the order of Government was ultra vires, and the election of 14th December therefore void except in so far as it concerned the one polling booth where polling had been stopped in November. The Election Commissioner further ordered that the votes cast in the other thirteen booths in November should be counted, and on the result ascertained by this count and by the polling in the one booth in December, he declared Mr. Nagappa Chettiar to be elected. Thereupon Mr. Venkatachalam Chettiar moved this Court to issue a writ of certiorari.

The question for our decision is whether the Election Commissioner had any jurisdiction to pass the orders which he has passed. It is clear that Mr. Nagappa Chettiar had no complaint to make with regard to the actual conduct of the election on the 14th. He attacked it solely on the ground that it ought never to have been ordered. The Election Commissioner therefore can have jurisdiction only if the order of the Government is either ultra vires of the election rules or mala fide. That the Government's order was ultra vires, it seems to us, to be impossible to maintain. It was passed under R. 35. Sub-s. (2) of that Rule, omitting unnecessary words, runs as follows :

> Pending .... the issue of final orders on any enquiry which the Local Government may institute upon receipt of any information that an election is being held in contravention of the rules, it shall be lawful for the Local Government to direct the stay of the election proceedings at any stage thereof prior to the declaration of the results.

This sub-section obviously contemplates the following : (i) Government may hold an enquiry ; (ii) they may hold it at any time before the results are declared ; and (iii) they may pass final orders on their enquiry. In the present case the Government state that they have held an enquiry, they did hold it before the results were declared, and they have passed final orders. We are unable to see how these orders can be questioned on the ground that Government had no power to pass them.

It was argued by Mr. Venkatarama Sastri for the respondent here that when once votes have been cast into the ballot-box and the hours of polling are over, the jurisdiction of Government ends and the jurisdiction of the Election Commissioner begins. But this argument overlooks the clear statement of R. 35 (2) that "election proceedings" continue and may be stayed by Government at any time before the results are declared and of course, the rules for the enquiry by the Election Commissioners into election petition show clearly enough that until results have been declared, there is nothing for an Election Commissioner to enquire about. We repeat therefore that Government were within their rights in passing the order of 3rd December.

Mr. Venkatarama Sastri then proceeds to argue that even if Government had the power to order a fresh election, the Election Court can come to its own conclusion whether the order was justified or not justified on the facts. But this view is contrary to the law of interference on revision, and we are unable to accept it. As stated already, respondent must now fail, unless he can show that Government's order was passed mala fide. On this point though Government's order is referred to and attacked on the ground of illegality in the petition to the Election Commissioner, there is no positive assertion whatever. We find accordingly that as Government's order was not ultra vires, and was not asserted to be mala fide, it was beyond the jurisdiction of the Election Court to consider it on its merits. The Election Court has therefore acted without jurisdiction in setting aside the election of the petitioner on 14th December and in declaring the respondent elected, and we must quash its orders. Respondent 1 must pay petitioner's costs. Vakil's fee Rs. 150.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 1373 of 1935, Decided on 8th October 1937, from order of Dist. Court, North Arcot at Vellore, D/- 26th September 1935.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 39, R. 1 and S. 151 — Powers of Subordinate Courts to issue injunction and punish disobedience thereof are confined within O. 39—S. 151 cannot be invoked to add to powers conferred by O. 39 —Mere act of taking possession in execution of decree after 'interim stay' order does not amount to breach of injunction punishable under O. 39.

Word "prescribed" in S. 94 undoubtedly means "prescribed by the rules". Whatever may be said as to the powers of the High Court to issue injunction for other purposes and to punish disobedience thereof in exercise of its own inherent power as a Court of record, the power of subordinate Courts must be found within the four corners of the Code, and when the Code has expressly dealt with the injunctions in O. 39, S. 151 cannot be invoked to add to the powers thus conferred. O. 39, R. 1 contemplates an injunction being granted only to prevent any property being wasted, damaged, or alienated by any party to the suit or wrongfully sold in execution of a decree. The mere act of taking possession in execution of a decree, after the Court's order merely stating "notice and interim stay" will not amount to a disobedience of an injunction punishable under O. 39. Order.—This revision petition arises out of an application to punish the petitioner for disobedience of an injunction issued by the District Munsif's Court at Ranipet. It will be convenient to describe the parties with reference to their array here. The petitioner had obtained a decree against one Kadirvelu Mudali, in O. S. No. 982 of 1928, for vacant possession of a piece of land on which part of a building stood. When the decree-holder went to take possession, he was resisted by the present respondent and M. P. No. 618 of 1932 was accordingly filed for removal for obstruction. An order for removal of obstruction was passed on 10th October 1932 and it is agreed that early on 11th October the Amin, to whom the warrant to carry out that order had been entrusted, went to the locality which is about two miles from the Court premises to carry out that order. The evidence also shows that the petitioner was present during the time that the Amin was carrying out that order. On 11th itself the respondent, against whom the order on M. P. No. 618 of 1932 had been passed, instituted O. S. No. 414 of 1932 apparently under O. 21, R. 103, and on the same day he filed M. P. No. 1666 of 1932 for an order restraining the defendant by a temporary injunction from executing the decree in O. S. No. 982 of 1928 and thereby demolishing the building and taking possession of the same until disposal of the suit. The petition purported to be under Rr. 1 and 2 presumably of O. 39, Civil P. C. and S. 151. This came on for orders sometime after 2 P. M. on 11th and the District Munsif passed an order "notice and interim stay".

The trouble in this case arises from the informal terms of the order on the injunction petition. A reference to Appendix F, Form No. 8 of the Civil Procedure Code, will show how temporary injunctions are expected to be framed. The order actually served on the petitioner does not correspond to the terms of Form No. 8. It stated that an order of interim stay had been passed in respect of the execution of the decree in O. S. No. 982 of 1928 and proceeded to add that the petitioner was accordingly bound not to do so. It is common ground that even before 2 P. M. on the 11th, some portions of the building on the site in question had been demolished and it is also admitted by the petitioner that at about 6 P. M. that evening he took formal delivery in terms of the receipt filed in this case. There was some question raised as to when the order of injunction was served on the petitioner, but I see no reason for not accepting the finding of the District Court that it must have been served upon him between 3 and 3.30 P. M. The learned District Judge himself finds that after service of this notice, the petitioner must have gone to his vakil at Ranipet and taken his advice as to the further course to be followed. It also appears from the evidence that even during the petitioner's absence, as the petitioner's vakil in the main case was present when the temporary injunction petition came on for orders before the District Munsif at 2 P. M., the District Munsif orally informed the petitioner's vakil of the order that he was passing. It may therefore be presumed, as stated by the District Munsif, that when the petitioner went to consult his vakil, the vakil would have advised him not to disobey the injunction. I do not therefore see sufficient reason to think that any demolition was likely to have taken place after the service of the order upon the petitioner.

The District Munsif however thought that the passing of the receipt of delivery and the act of taking delivery therein implied amounts to a "technical" breach of the injunction and curiously he added that it was significant that the petitioner went to the scene even on the next day, as though that will amount to a breach of the injunction. As in his view the disobedience was only technical, he directed that the petitioner should be imprisoned for a week. The learned Judge on appeal disagreed with the view that the disobedience was only technical; but I cannot help thinking that the learned Judge has been carried away by his opinion that even apart from the injunction, the act of demolition was highhanded and unauthorized from beginning to end, because he thought that the order passed on M. P. No. 618 of 1932 did not warrant it. It is unnecessary for me to canvass the correctness of this conclusion, because that is not a matter that arises for consideration in this proceeding. We have only got to see whether there has been any disobedience of the injunction said to have been passed in M. P. No. 1666 of 1932.

I am unable to agree with the view that the taking of delivery implied in the passing of the delivery receipt is punishable as an act of disobedience of the injunction. O. 39, R. 1, Civil P. C., contemplates an injunction being granted only to prevent any property being wasted, damaged, or alienated by any party to the suit or wrongfully sold in execution of a decree. This certainly would not include the mere act of taking possession in execution of a decree. I am aware it has been sometimes held that O. 39 and Rr. 1 and 2, are not exhaustive of the Court's power to grant a temporary injunction: see 7 M L W 328,[1] 95 I C 196[2] and 73 I C 909.[3] A different view was taken in 24 Bom L R 378,[4] and I must add that the cases which held that O. 39 is not exhaustive do not seem to have given due weight to the words "if it is so prescribed" occurring in the opening paragraph of S. 94 of the Code. "Prescribed" in that section undoubtedly means "prescribed by the Rules". Whatever may be said as to the power of the High Court to issue injuno-tion for other purposes and to punish disobedience thereof in exercise of its own inherent power as a Court of Record, the power of subordinate Courts must be found within the four corners of the Code and it seems to me too much to suggest that, when the Code has expressly dealt with the injunctions in O. 39, S. 151 can be invoked to add to the powers thus conferred. I do not however discuss this question further, because even assuming for the sake of argument that the Court has such power, I have still got to see what the order in this case was and whether there was any reason for the petitioner to assume that the Court granted an injunction wider in scope than O. 39, R. 1 contemplates.

As I have stated already, the Court's order merely stated "interim stay" and the notice actually served on the petitioner did not make matters clearer. Whether a delivery taken after an order of that kind will not be void in law is another matter; but I see no justification for holding that the taking of delivery in those circumstances will amount to a disobedience of an injunction punishable under O. 39. If I were satisfied that even after 3.30 P. M. on 11th October the petitioner was a party to any further demolition, I should not have hesitated to deal with him as he deserved. But though the respondent alleged and sought to prove that the demolition continued up to 10 P. M. that night and even for a part of the next day, neither Court has accepted that version, and both the Courts have based the order against the petitioner only on the ground that he took delivery after service of the injunction order. I am unable to hold that this conduct of the petitioner will amount to a breach of the injunction. On this ground, I set aside the order of the Courts below, but as the petitioner has undoubtedly acted in haste and has been in some degree responsible for bringing about this situation, I make no order as to the costs of this civil revision petition.

Criminal Revision Case No. 384 and Petition No. 352 of 1937, Decided on 30th September 1937, from order of Dist. Magistrate, Ramnad, D/- 12th June 1937.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 503—Witness in Burma—District Magistrate in India cannot issue commission.

Burma has now ceased to be a part of British India and therefore a District Magistrate in British India cannot issue a commission for the examination of any witness in Burma as S. 503 does not empower him to issue a commission beyond British India : 5 Bom 338 and 4 I C 400, Rel. on. [P 192 C 2]

N. Surayanarayana — for Petitioner.

T. L. Venkatarama Aiyer — for Respondent.

Public Prosecutor — for the Crown.

Order.—This is an application to revise an order of the District Magistrate refusing to issue a commission for the examination of a witness in Burma and the sole question for determination is whether the District Magistrate has jurisdiction to issue the commission. S. 503, Criminal P. C., does not empower the District Magistrate to issue a commission for the examination of any witness beyond British India or the territories of any Prince or Chief in India, where there is an officer representing the British Indian Government, vide 5 Bom 338[1] and 10 Cr L J 571,[2] and it is not disputed that Burma has ceased to be part of British India. The existence of Magistrates in Burma to whom commissions might issue if permissible under the Criminal Procedure Code has no bearing and it follows that the District Magistrate has no power to issue the commission. The revision petition therefore fails and is dismissed.

Appeals Nos. 327 and 421 of 1931, Decided on 28th September 1937, against decrees of Sub-Judge, Guntur, in O. S. Nos. 54 of 1929 and 13 of 1931.

(a) Grant—Extent of — Original grant by pre-British Government produced — Inam title deed in British rule not curtailing rights conferred by terms of original grant — Original grant is best evidence of what has been granted by Crown.

The law undoubtedly is, that after a cession of territory, the only enforcible rights in respect of lands ceded, are those subsequently conferred by the Crown by express or implied agreement, or by legislation. The British Government were not bound to recognize the revenue free grants of the previous Governments, though in practice they did recognize them. But when the original sanad is produced and the inam title deed does not curtail or limit the right conferred by its terms, the original grant remains the best evidence of what has been granted by the Crown as the result of the inam enquiry : A I R 1915 P C 59 and A I R 1921 P C 1, Rel. on. [P 194 C 2]

(b) Res judicata — Suit by inam holder for declaration that he was owner of whole village excluding communal porambokes—Decree in terms asked for granted but tank-beds whether communal porambokes not decided — Decree does not make title to tank-beds res judicata.

A suit was brought by an inam holder for a declaration that the whole village except certain minor inams and communal porambokes was granted to him. The decree declared the right of the inam holder to the entire village exoluding minor inams and communal porambokes. Whether tanks or tank beds were communal porambokes was a question that was neither raised nor decided :

Held that the decree did not make the title to the tank-beds res judicata. [P 195 C 1,2]

(c) Grant — Grant of village — Irrigation tanks are not communal porambokes and hence can be held to pass under grant—Tank within inam limits passed under grant.

The Government cannot be presumed in making a grant to include in it communal property, i. e. what the villagers own in common : 24 M L J 86, Rel.on. [P 196 C 1]

Where tanks were primarily intended for irrigation purposes and were used as irrigation sources, the mere fact that the villagers sometimes used the water for other purposes, such as for drinking, for bathing or for washing cattle, does not suffice to create any rights of ownership in them. The true position in regard to irrigation tanks is that they do not belong to the community as such, the rights of irrigation, appertaining as they do, to the lands irrigated; such rights therefore as the owners of these lands possess, are in the nature of easements : A I R 1925 Mad 139, Rel. on. [P 196 C 1]

Such tanks not being public or communal porambokes there is nothing to prevent their passing under the wide terms of a grant. Moreover where the tank or channel is wholly within the limits of the inam, it must be held to pass under the grant. [P 196 C 2]

(d) Evidence Act (1872), S. 110 — Case under Madras Land Encroachment Act — Presumption under S. 110 does not operate—But long possession can be relied on as evidence of grant by original owner.

Section 110, no doubt, enacts that title is to be presumed from lawful possession. This is a rebuttable presumption and like all rebuttable presumptions, must yield to proof. Where therefore title is proved or assumed, the presumption created by S. 110 can no longer apply. Madras Land Encroachment Act, S. 2 declares, subject to a saving clause, that the Government is the owner of certain kinds of property including the beds of tanks. There is no conflict between S. 110 Evidence Act, and this provision. The title of the Government being statutorily declared, the rule of presumption enacted by S. 110 is not brought into play. But there is nothing to prevent long possession being relied upon as evidence of a grant made by the original owner : Case law referred. [P 197 C 1]

(e) Grant—Tank-beds in agraharam openly cultivated by agraharamdar — Government collecting cesses but not assessment — Effect is admission of Agraharamdar's title by Government.

Certain tanks situated in an agraharam ceased to be used for purpose of irrigation and the tank-beds were openly cultivated by the Agraharamdars. The Government collected cesses, but forbore from collecting assessment :

Held that collecting cesses but forbearing to collect assessment almost amounted to an admission on Government's part of the Agraharamdar's title to the tank-beds whether the Government so intended it or not. [P 198 C 1]

 (f) Limitation — Declaratory suit — Bare repudiation of person's title without overt act would not make incumbent on him to bring declaratory suit — Successive denials of title — Owner of title may ignore any particular denial and can base his cause of action on any fresh denial.

There is nothing in law which says that the moment a person's right is denied, he is bound at his peril to bring a suit for declaration. It would be most unreasonable to hold that a bare repudiation of a person's title, without even an overt act, would make it incumbent on him to bring a declaratory suit. A party surely has a right to elect as to when he may bring a suit for vindicating his right, when there are several or successive denials. True, a mere continuation of a prior cause of action does not give rise to a fresh right, for instance, where property is attached, the procuring of the attachment is the wrongful denial and the cause of action arises when the attachment is effected; in such a case it is wrong to hold that there has been a "continuing wrong" so as to give a fresh starting point during the whole period the attachment subsists. But from this it does not follow that an owner can never ignore an attack against his title, however casual or trivial, without his right to sue being imperilled in respect of a subsequent invasion. It is for the plaintiff to decide at his option, on which act he chooses to found his cause of action, and when he does so, it is with reference to the particular infringement he alleges that the limitation should be reckoned : Case law referred. [P 198 C 2; P 199 C 1]

Venkatasubba Rao J.—The question raised in this appeal is whether the tank-bed lands in question are the property of the Agraharamdars (the plaintiffs) or the Government (the defendant). The suit has been filed with a view to get a declaration that the lands belong to the Agraharamdars, and to get a refund of the penal assessment, alleged to have been wrongly levied from them. The plaintiffs trace their title to a confirmatory grant in their favour of 1797, made by the then zamindar of Narasaraopet (Ex. A.) This refers to a yet earlier grant of an unknown date (not forthcoming) and the plaintiffs rely upon the recitals in Ex. A, wide and unqualified, to the effect that the whole village is granted "inclusive of the hills, channels, saline lands, donkas, tank-bed lands" within the boundaries specified. It will be seen that there is in this grant a specific mention of the tank-bed lands, which are expressly conveyed. The Agraharamdars next rely upon a conveyance of 1844, under which they acquired a portion of this agraharam from certain third parties. There again the tanks are in terms mentioned among the rights appertaining to the property conveyed. This agraharam came within the purview of the inam enquiry instituted by the Government and in 1860 it was both confirmed and enfranchised and an inam title deed was issued to the Agraharamdar (Ex. G.) What was granted and confirmed "as freehold in perpetuity" was the entire village, nothing having been excluded. In the title deed issued by the Government, it was the title of the plaintiffs' ancestors "to the agraharam village" that was acknowledged on behalf of the Governor-in-Council. In the Inam Fair Register (Ex. F.) there is a recital on which the plaintiffs strongly rely. It refers to the sanad of 1797, and goes on to say that it appears therefrom that the original grant comprised the entire village, excluding only the common village site, and certain minor inams, which had already been carved out. The plaintiffs take their stand upon these documents and ask: If the pre-British grant was unqualified and was of the entire village, inclusive of the tank beds, and that grant was duly confirmed by the Governor-in-Council, how can the Government sustain their present claim? The plaintiffs complain that the Judge in the Court below, who has negatived their claim, has misunderstood the issue to be tried and has misconceived the law to be applied.

In our opinion the learned Judge has not given due effect to the completeness of the grant evidenced by the original sanad and the inam title deed. At the inam enquiry there was an express reference, as already observed, to the comprehensiveness of the original grant, and when the proceedings culminated in the issue of the title deed, the tank-beds which had been specifically conveyed by the sanad were not excluded. What is even more significant is that certain items were particularized as having been excepted, and neither the tanks nor the tank-bed lands were among those so excluded. The law undoubtedly is that after a cession of territory, the only enforcible rights in respect of lands ceded are those subsequently conferred by the Crown by express or implied agreement, or by legislation: 42 I A 229.[1] The British Government, as observed in 40 Mad 664[2] at p. 667, were not bound to recognize the revenue free grants of the previous Governments, though in practice they did recognize them. But when the original sanad is produced and the inam title deed does not curtail or limit the right conferred by its terms, the original grant remains the best evidence of what has been granted by the Crown as result of the inam enquiry. This is the effect of the pronouncement of the Judicial Committee in 48 I A 56.[3] That case is also valuable as showing that their Lordships recognize the existence of Indian documents, where apt words occur intended to create a complete interest in land, including even the right to minerals (see page 65). "In the clearer light afforded" (to use the language of their Lordships—vide page 66) by the original grant produced here which expressly conveys the tank-beds, no inference can be drawn against the agraharamdars from the non-mention of those items in the inam title deed—more especially in view of the exclusion of certain specified items other than the tank-beds in the Inam Register. This being so, it remains to consider whether the Government have made out their claim in the face of these documents that they are the owners of the lands in question.

It is contended by the Government that there is a finding in a former suit, which constitutes the question res judicata. How the lower Court was persuaded to accept this contention is inconceivable. The agraharamdars filed the previous suit, O. S. No. 7 of 1905, for a declaration that the whole village was granted to them and not merely certain specified portions thereof, as then contended by the Government. A decree was made by Mr. Rice, the District Judge, who heard the suit upholding the agraharamdars' claim in its entirety. Though the plaint in the previous suit has not been filed, the schedule thereto containing the particulars of the property claimed has been exhibited. From that schedule, it appears that the agraharamdars claimed the entire village less certain minor inams with which we are not concerned, and communal porambokes. The decree that was passed granted to the agraharamdars all that they had asked for in the plaint. In the course of his judgment, Mr. Rice refers to the inam proceedings and says that the Inam Fair Register granted what was exactly claimed in the inam statement, neither more nor less. The formal decree that was drawn up follows the terms of this judgment and declares the right of the agraharamdars to the entire village, "exclusive of the porambokes and the minor inams not claimed at the inam settlement."

From what has been said above, it becomes clear that what were excluded by the decree were (besides the minor inams) communal porambokes alone. It further appears that to those items no claim was ever put forward, not even at the inam enquiry, by the agraharamdars. The effect of the previous decree then is to declare merely that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the communal porambokes and it does nothing more. Whether the tanks and the tank-beds were communal porambokes or not, was not a question that was raised and the decree does not profess to decide it. It is impossible to hold, as the lower Court has done, that this decree has made the title to the tank-beds res judicata.

The learned Judge ignoring the scope of the previous suit and brushing aside the express wording of the decree, seizes upon some passage in Mr. Rice's judgment—which both sides have had to confess is obscure—and infers therefrom that the plea of res judicata has been made out. The obscurity has arisen from the fact that the Government, whose duty it was to file the pleadings in the previous suit, have not done so, and strictly speaking, the plea of res judicata ought not to have been entertained at all. Before Mr. Rice, some contest seems to have been raised, in regard to the ownership of some 120 odd acres of land in the village. The Government claimed that that land was liable to be assessed and the agraharamdars asserted the contrary. At the inam enquiry this extent was apparently not taken into account in fixing the quit-rent and the Government seem to have urged that it should accordingly be deemed as comprised in the excluded poramboke. By way of answer, the agraharamdars appear to have contended that the reason for its exclusion was not that it was poramboke, but because it was then thought not worth cultivating. Mr. Rice, after accepting the agraharamdars' version, observes towards the end of his judgment: "The actual result appears to be to deprive Government of the power of assessing about 120 acres of valueless land". On this unsatisfactory and tenuous foundation the lower Court bases its finding of res judicata. It must be remembered that at that time the tanks were functioning as irrigation sources and no question of the Government's "power of assessing" could possibly have arisen in regard to them. The lower Court's treatment of this question has been perfunctory and its conclusion cannot be accepted. In this connexion we must own to some surprise at the remark made by the Judge, that every presumption should be drawn against the agraharamdars, who failed to produce the inam statement. In the course of the inam proceedings, they produced a copy of this statement, which they say has since been lost. The inam statement is a part of the Government records and the agraharamdars applied to Government, for the purpose of this suit, for copies both of the inam statement and of the Inam Register. A copy of the Register was furnished, but the Government failed to grant a copy of the statement, presumably on the ground that they were unable to do so. How, in the circumstances, any blame attaches to the agraharamdars is incomprehensible.

The question then arises, as already stated, are the suit lands communal porambokes? This question is relevant for two purposes: first, on account of the previous judgment already referred to and secondly, because of the sound rule of construction that the Government cannot be presumed in making a grant to include in it communal property, i. e. what the villagers own in common: 24 M L J 36[4] at p. 40. That these tanks were primarily intended for irrigation purposes and were used as irrigation sources is not seriously denied. The learned Judge assumes this though he does not find so in various places in his judgment. The mere fact that the villagers sometimes used the water for other purposes, such as for drinking, for bathing, or for washing cattle, does not suffice to create any rights of ownership in them. Usually, in a village, interference with such acts is not called for until some question of title is raised, and no importance therefore attaches to such user. When the inam title deed was issued and the quit rent computed, some cultivated area was treated as wet land and there can be no doubt that the wet cultivation became possible by reason of the existence of these tanks. The true position in regard to irrigation tanks is, that they do not belong to the community as such, the rights of irrigation appertaining as they do to the lands irrigated: such rights therefore as the owners of these lands possess are in the nature of easements: 20 M L W 185.[5] It is an admitted fact here, that besides the Agraharamdars, the only proprietor that used the water for irrigation, was the karnam in respect of his minor inam. The tanks became useless as irrigation sources in 1915, owing to heavy rains and breaches and since then the Agraharamdars have been using the tank-beds as cultivable land. It is a question that does not arise here and nobody raises it, whether or not the minor inamdar's easement has become extinguished, granting that he once possessed such a right. At any rate, even by the date of the suit (and it is now seven years since it was filed) the easement had not been exercised for about fourteen years. However that be, the point is clear beyond doubt that the tanks were not public or communal tanks and therefore there was nothing to prevent their passing under the wide terms of the grant.

Some cases have been cited at the Bar relating to tanks or channels. The principle underlying those decisions seems to be this: where the tank or channel is wholly within the limits of the inam, as in the present case, it must be held to pass under the grant. The question was not considered whether or not it was communal property, but presumably it was assumed that it was not: 23 M L J 109.[6] But where from the source, lands other than those of the inamdar are also irrigated, it being the function of the Government to conserve and control works of irrigation, it would be right to presume, in the absence of an express grant, that the tank or channel was not intended to be conveyed, the reason being that it would be injurious to introduce divided responsibility and divided control, 28 Mad 539[7] and 24 M L J 36,[4] although this principle was departed from and the inamdar's right was recognized in 37 Mad 369.[8] It is sufficient to say here that judged by any test, the tanks in question passed under the grant to the plaintiffs.

This finding as to the title based upon the grant would be sufficient to dispose of the case, apart from the question of limitation which we shall presently consider: but we have been referred to acts of possession and enjoyment on the part of the Agraharamdars, as furnishing independent evidence of their title. Mr. N. Srinivasa Ayyangar for the Government Pleader broadly contends however that as against the Crown, when the question is one under the Land Encroachment Act, possession can never be relied upon as evidence of ownership. There is a fallacy underlying this argument as we shall show. S. 110 of the Evidence Act, no doubt enacts that title is to be presumed from lawful possession. This is a rebuttable presumption and like all rebuttable presumptions must yield to proof. Where therefore title is proved or assumed, the presumption created by S. 110 can no longer apply. Now turning to the Land Encroachment Act, S. 2 declares, subject to a saving clause, that the Government is the owner of certain kinds of property, including the beds of tanks. There is no conflict between the section of the Evidence Act and this provision. The title of the Government being statutorily declared, the rule of presumption enacted by S. 110 is not brought into play. But is there anything to prevent long possession being relied upon as evidence of a grant made by the original owner ? The very argument based on grant presupposes title in the party said to have made the grant. Therefore it is one thing to say that you cannot use the fact of possession as evidence of title, but it is quite a different thing to argue therefrom that you cannot rely upon it in support of a grant. Where there was evidence of exclusive possession for a long period of a pew annexed to a dwelling house in the parish, it was held —upon the principle that a legal origin ought to be presumed if a legal origin be possible—that the grant of a faculty ought to be presumed : (1891) A C 228.[9] That this principle extends to cases where the Government was the original owner has been established by very authoritative decisions. In 35 I A 195,[10] the Judicial Committee, after finding that the plaintiff otherwise failed to establish his title held upon the proof afforded by his long possession and enjoyment that his title was made out. Again in 19 I A 69,[11] their Lordships point out that if the question were one of limitation, the defendant was bound to fail, but if the possession was used for making out a title, there was sufficient evidence in support of it : see also 57 I A 125,[12] decided by the Judicial Committee and the observation of Varadachariar J. in 1936 M W N 1315[13] at p. 1326.

Now looking at the evidence in this aspect, it seems to us that there is sufficiently long possession on the part of the plaintiffs in assertion of a title, attributable to a grant in their favour. The inam title deed, as already stated, was issued to them in 1860. Since then the plaintiffs have been constantly exercising acts of ownership. There is a lease of the same year (Ex. D) executed by the agraharamdars, which shows their possession. Again in 1876 (by D.1), in 1883 and 1897 (by E. Series) they leased out various portions of the tank bunds. Further, they effected repairs to the tanks in 1887 (j), 1898 (k), and 1907 (J.1, GG and GG.1), and incurred expenses in that connexion. That they were in possession without question previous to the suit of 1905 is a fact which cannot be disputed. Indeed, the Government seems to have assumed before the decree in that case that the plaintiffs were lawfully in possession and that its own right commenced from the date of and in virtue of that decree. On 5th August 1907, the Board of Revenue passed a proceeding (Ex. 23) stating that the finding of the District Court over-rides the general law that "porambokes in whole inam villages belong to the inamdars" and that the latter should accordingly be prevented from leasing the tank porambokes in future. This shows beyond doubt that the inamdars were till then in possession without their right being challenged. Orders similar to this were in the years 1907 and 1908 issued by the Government, but the plaintiffs' possession was never interfered with or disturbed. One such order was that issued by the Collector on 2nd August 1908 (Ex. 23-c) to which we shall refer later, when considering the question of limitation. Then from 1915, as already observed, the tanks ceased to be useful as such and the tank-beds were openly cultivated. And what did the Government do? It started levying about the year 1920 (and went on doing so) not assessment as one might expect, but cesses as the Local Board's agent (see the evidence of D. W. 3, p. 171). The evidence on this point has been completely misread and misunderstood by the trial Judge. Numerous exhibits bearing on this have been filed, and a scrutiny of one of them, Ex. I-e, by way of example, will show that the amounts collected were cesses and do not represent the assessment. The evidence of P. W. 6 (at pp. 146 and 148), which remains uncontradicted, proves this conclusively. The lower Court observes, almost casually, that the wet assessment was collected, which statement is clearly wrong and the learned counsel for the Government was unable to support it. Collecting the cesses and forbearing from collecting the assessment, almost amounts to an admission on the Government's part of the Agraharamdars' title, whether the Government so intended it or not. We merely refer to this and do not propose to use it against the Government. Then for the first time in 1929, the Government levied assessment and this suit was immediately brought. Thus our finding as to the title receives support, if support were necessary, from the evidence of possession and enjoyment to which we have referred.

The next question that arises is whether the lower Court's view that the suit is barred by limitation is right. There are two reliefs claimed : (i) for a declaration of the plaintiff's title and (ii) for the refund of the penal assessment levied. The amount was collected on 27th March 1929 and the suit was filed within six months from that date. How in the teeth of S. 14, Land Encroachment Act, the learned Judge has held that the suit for the refund is barred, we are unable to follow. That section expressly provides that in respect of any assessment or penalty, the cause of action arises on the date on which it is levied. Even where there has been more than one levy, it has been held that a suit for refund brought within six months of the last of the levies, (the previous levy not having been challenged) is not barred in respect of such last levy under S. 14, the question however being left open as to the limitation applicable to a suit for declaration : 16 M L W 197.[14] The question in the present case is much simpler, there having been no previous levy and there is thus not even the semblance of an excuse for holding that the suit is barred in respect of the relief for refund. It must be observed that the learned Government Pleader has not sought to justify the lower Court's decision on this point.

Then as to the relief praying for a declaration the learned Judge's view is also wrong. He seems to think that the suit ought to have been brought within six years of the Collector's order dated 2nd August 1908, Ex. 23-c, to which we have already referred. There is nothing in law which says that the moment a person's right is denied, he is bound at his peril to bring a suit for declaration. The Government beyond passing the order did nothing to disturb the plaintiff's possession. It would be most unreasonable to hold that a bare repudiation of a person's title, without even an overt act, would make it incumbent on him to bring a declaratory suit. A party surely has a right to elect as to when he may bring a suit for vindicating his right, when there are several or successive denials. If a person's right is called in question, he may ignore that particular attack or challenge; but that does not mean that a fresh attack does not give rise to a fresh cause of action. There may be an ineffectual threat, a brutum fulmen : see the judgment of Coutts-Trotter C. J. in 47 Mad 927,[15] which a person may ignore, without his right to bring a suit in respect of a subsequent invasion being impaired. When an attachment was followed by an execution sale, it was held that there was a fresh invasion of the owner's right and that the sale gave rise to a fresh cause of action; his forbearance to sue on the first occasion did not debar him from suing, when by reason of the sale there was a greater invasion of his right: 22 M L J 108.[16] True a mere continuation of a prior cause of action does not give rise to a fresh right—for instance, where property is attached, the procuring of the attachment is the wrongful denial and the cause of action arises when the attachment is effected; in such a case it is wrong to hold that there has been a "continuing wrong" so as to give a fresh starting point during the whole period the attachment subsists: 26 Mad 410.[17] But from this it does not follow that an owner can never ignore an attack against his title however casual or trivial, without his right to sue being imperilled in respect of a subsequent invasion. There is no inconsistency between the two cases cited above, 22 M L J 108[16] and 26 Mad 410,[17] as seems to have been assumed (with great respect) wrongly in (1914) M W N 197.[18] The facts of the last mentioned case do not appear sufficiently from the report; but if the effect of the decision is that where there are several acts the earliest of them alone furnishes the starting point, we must express our dissent from that view: see also 47 Mad 927[15] at p. 932, where Ramesam J. also disagrees with this opinion, though no case is particularized. It is for the plaintiff to decide at his option, on which act he chooses to found his cause of action, and when he does so, it is with reference to the particular infringement he alleges, that the limitation should be reckoned : cf. 58 I A 125[19] at p. 140. It is a more difficult question, what is the extent of the injury or infringement that gives rise to, what may be termed, a compulsory cause of action? In 47 Mad 927,[15] already referred to, Ramesam J. indicates that where a penal assessment has been levied, the person affected cannot be allowed to ignore the payment and rely on a later proceeding, the reason being that the levy of the assessment amounts to a virtual loss of his right. On the facts of the present case a question of this sort does not arise.

Then turning to the lower Court's judgment, it is difficult to see how 47 Mad 572[20] relied on by the Subordinate Judge, is applicable. The plaintiff there preferred objections to the exclusion of the lands in suit from the rough pattah granted to him by the Government. His objections were definitely rejected in 1905. The suit that was brought to set aside the order of rejection and to obtain a declaration of his right was not instituted until 1913. The Judicial Committee held that the claim was barred under Art. 120. In that case there was an overt act, namely the issue of the pattah and moreover the invasion of the right complained against was the order passed in 1905, which on the plaintiff's own showing furnished the starting point. In the present case, as already observed, no effect was given to the proceeding that was passed and such possession or enjoyment as the plaintiffs had was never disturbed; nor is the cause of action here based on that proceeding. The suit therefore even in respect of the relief of declaration is not barred. The appellants do not press their claim in regard to item 3. The result therefore is that the lower Court's decree, in so far as it relates to items 1 and 2, is set aside and the appeal to that extent is allowed with full costs throughout. We understand that the decree should be for the amount claimed in the plaint less Rs. 3.7.0.

Appeal No. 421 of 1931.

From the judgment just delivered by us in the connected case, it follows that this appeal also to the extent indicated there should succeed and it is accordingly so allowed with full costs throughout. Deduct from the amount claimed Rs. 3.7.0. Under S. 82, Civil P. C., we fix three months' time for compliance with the decrees.

[These appeals having been set down "to be spoken to" this day, the Court delivered the following]

Judgment. — This matter is posted before us for being spoken to, at the request of the Government Pleader. He says in his letter that the terms of our injunction may appear too wide in view of the recent amendment of the Madras Estates Land Act. Our judgment proceeds upon the footing that the suit lands are non-communal property; apart from that, we could not have intended by our judgment to deal with matters which were not raised in the pleadings or with the supposed rights that came into existence subsequent to the suit.

City Civil Court Appeals Nos. 45 to 51 of 1935, Decided on 31st August 1937, against decrees of City Civil Judge, Madras, in O. S. Nos. 586 to 588 and 592, 597, 598 and 600 of 1933.

(a) Trust—Breach of—Debtor and Creditor —Composition — Debtor executing composition deed in favour of one creditor who agreed to composition—Such creditor receiving amount for distribution becomes trustee—Payment by such trustee to such creditors only who accept composition when funds are not sufficient to satisfy all creditors does not amount to breach of trust—Trustee commits breach by paying to himself whole balance when he knows that one creditor is willing to accept composition.

Where a majority of the creditors agree to accept a composition of some annas in a rupee and a composition deed is executed by the debtor in favour of one of the creditors, and such creditor receives the amount for the distribution, he becomes a trustee in respect of such amount. If such a trustee distributes all the amount he has received, which is not sufficient to satisfy all the creditors, among such creditors only who accept the composition while the rest of the creditors have knowledge of such composition he does not commit a breach of trust. But he commits a breach of trust if he pays to himself the balance of the funds remaining in his hands when he has knowledge that one more creditor is willing to accept the composition and the funds are not sufficient to pay off such a creditor, for it is his duty to share the balance rateably with such a creditor. [P 201 C 2; P 202 C 1]

(b) Debtor and Creditor—Composition deed—Every creditor need not execute deed—He can signify his acquiescence by other means.

In the case of a deed of trust for the benefit of the creditors, it is not absolutely necessary that every creditor should execute the deed. A creditor can signify his acquiescence in it by other means. Unless he expresses in some manner his willingness to accept the deed he cannot claim any benefit under the deed. He cannot stand idly by: (1841) 1 Dr & War 227 and (1858) 24 Beav 642, Rel. on. [P 201 C 2]

Appeal No. 45 of 1935

Leach C. J.—The appellant was the plaintiff in the Court below. The suit was one to recover a sum of Rs. 1257-2-0 alleged to be due to the appellant under a deed of composition entered into by respondent 2 with his creditors. Respondent 1 was sued as the trustee under the deed. In 1930 respondent 2 who at all material times was a merchant carrying on business in Madras became financially involved and by the month of July 1930, he owed his creditors an aggregate sum of over Rs. 88,000. There were 26 creditors altogether, 14 of them being resident in Madras and 12 resident in Mysore. At a meeting of the Madras creditors, it was agreed that they should accept a composition of four annas in the rupee. A deed was drawn up on this basis and executed by respondent 2 in favour of respondent 1 as trustee for the creditors. Respondent 1 was himself a creditor for a sum of over Rs. 15,000. The total amount required to pay a composition of four annas in the rupee was about Rs. 22,000. Respondent 2 had not got the cash, but on 2nd August 1930 certain property owned by him was sold and the proceeds, Rupees 12,250, handed over to respondent 1, as part of the Rs. 22,000 which respondent 2 was due to pay to him under the deed. Later that year, two further sums, one of Rs. 1500 and the other of Rs. 1750 were paid to respondent 1 by respondent 2, making a total payment to him of Rupees 15,500. The Madras creditors in due course signed the deed, but the Mysore creditors were not so ready to accept it. It is clear from the evidence that they were fully aware of the proposal by the month of October 1930, but only two of them agreed to the arrangement then. These two signed the deed and in due course received payments of four annas in the rupee on the amounts of their debts. The Madras creditors also received the amounts due to them under the deed of composition. Respondent 1 admits that the appellant signified his acceptance of the deed in a letter dated 24th December 1930. By that time, the Madras creditors, apart from respondent 1, had all been paid what was due to them under the deed, as had two of the Mysore creditors. Respondent 1 had in his hands on 24th December 1930, a sum of Rs. 3804-4-6, which was only sufficient to pay him three annas and nine pies on the amount due to him. He did not allocate this money to his own debt then, but kept it in a suspense account where it remained until the month of November 1931, when he transferred it to himself. When he did this, he had notice of the appellant's acceptance of the composition and had that notice for nearly 12 months. As respondent 2 did not pay the balance of the Rs. 22,000 to him he was not able to make any further payments to the creditors. Having allocated Rs. 3804-4-6 to himself there was nothing to pay to any of them. The appellant then launched a suit against respondent 1 as trustee and against respondent 2 as the principal debtor to recover the sum of Rs. 1257-2-0, representing a quarter of the total amount due to him by respondent 2. He also claimed interest on this amount. The suit however failed. I might mention here that the other nine Mysore creditors who remained unpaid, filed similar suits in the City Civil Court to recover their proportions. They met with the same fate as the appellant and have filed appeals which have been heard together with this appeal. There are however points of difference between this case and the other cases and it will be convenient to deal with them in separate judgments.

In the trial Court, it was contended by the appellant that respondent 2 had in fact paid to respondent 1 the whole of the Rs. 22,000. This plea was based on an allegation that respondent 2 had handed over to respondent 1 two promissory notes for sums of Rs. 2000 and Rs. 5000 respectively. This plea has been maintained before us. The learned trial Judge however held that these promissory notes were never handed over to respondent 1 and that all that respondent 1 received was the Rs. 15,500 which I have mentioned. We see no reason to disagree with this finding. The learned Judge dismissed the suit as against respondent 1 on the following grounds : (1) The Mysore creditors of whom the appellant was one, had not accepted the deed of composition ; (2) the deed was an incomplete contract and gave rise to no rights and imposed no liabilities; (3) respondent 1 was not a trustee and that he had made payments to the Madras creditors and to the two Mysore creditors as the agent of respondent 2 ; and (4) he was under no duty to pay the creditors rateably and was therefore entitled to appropriate the balance of Rs. 3804.4.6, towards his own debt. The learned Judge accordingly dismissed the suit as against respondent 1 but he decreed it as prayed against respondent 2.

The learned Judge erred in treating respondent 1 merely as an agent of respondent 2. A deed of composition was entered into by a majority of the creditors. This deed was signed by the respondents and under it respondent 1 received Rupees 15,500 for distribution among the creditors. Respondent 1 was therefore clearly a trustee in respect of this sum. It must be remembered however that the deed was entered into, on the understanding that respondent 2 would pay to respondent 1 sufficient for the payment of a composition of four annas in the rupee to all the creditors. Respondent 1 paid the Madras creditors and the two Mysore creditors when they applied for the moneys due to them under the deed and there can be no doubt that he hoped that at a later stage the other creditors would come in and that he would be put in funds to pay them the amounts due to them. It became apparent in 1931 that respondent 2 was not in a position to make any more payments and it was then that he allocated the Rupees 3804.4.6 to his own debt. We do not consider that there was any breach of trust on the part of respondent 1 in making the payments to the Madras creditors and to the two Mysore creditors. These payments were all made before the appellant or the plaintiffs in the other suits had signified their intention of accepting the composition. The other plaintiffs did not in fact signify their willingness to accept the composition until a few months before the suit was filed in July 1933. That was long after the payments had been made. In (1841) 1 Dr & War 227=58 R R 253[1] it was held that in the case of a deed of trust for the benefit of creditors it is not absolutely necessary that every creditor should execute the deed. A creditor could signify his acquiescence in it by other means. The Lord Chancellor (Sir Edward Sagden, afterwards Lord St. Leonards) observed :

> The principle upon which this Court acts in cases like the present, is no longer in dispute . . . . It was argued for the defendants that Mr. Field did not execute the deed at the proper time, and that when, in point of fact, he did execute, he did so without the assent or authority of any person qualified to permit him. But it is not absolutely necessary that the creditor should execute the deed ; if he had assented to it, if he had acquiesced in it, or acted under its provisions, and complied with its terms, and the other side expressed no dissatisfaction, the settled law of the Courts is that he is entitled to its benefits. The mere fact of his signature is not actually required.

But there must be actual assent to the deed. Unless the creditor in some manner expresses his willingness to accept it, he cannot claim any benefit under it. This was emphasized in (1858) 24 Beav 642.[2] He cannot stand idly by, but if he does some act which amounts to acquiescence, it is sufficient. The position here is that all the creditors who had assented to the deed by November 1930, were paid what was due to them under it and we consider that as the other creditors had not signified their intention of coming in, although they were aware of the arrangement, respondent 1 was in the circumstances of the case justified in paying out to those who had signified their assent. Therefore we agree that so far as the payments to the Madras creditors and to the two Mysore creditors are concerned, there was no breach of trust on the part of respondent 1.

1. Field v. Lord Donoughmore, (1841) 1 Dr & War 227=58 R R 253.
2. Biron v. Mount, (1858) 24 Beav 642 = 27 L J Ch 191=4 Jur (N S) 43.

But the case against him does not rest there. It is admitted that he paid himself Rs. 3804.4.6 after he had notice of the appellant's willingness to accept the composition and he paid himself this sum at a time when he knew that there would be no further payments to him by respondent 2 in order to carry out the terms of the composition deed in their entirety. In these circumstances it seems to us that respondent 1 was guilty of a breach of trust so far as the appellant is concerned. He had no right, knowing that there was another creditor willing to accept the composition, to pay himself the balance of the funds which remained in his hands. As a trustee, his duty was to share that balance rateably with the appellant. It was not a case of acting without notice of the appellant's claim. He had full notice of that claim. The appellant is therefore entitled to a decree against respondent 1 for a proportion of the sum of Rs. 3804.4.6. It is agreed that on this basis, the appellant will be entitled to recover from respondent 1 Rs. 920. The appeal will be allowed as against respondent 1 and the decree of the trial Court varied by substituting as against him a decree in favour of the appellant for Rs. 920 with interest at 6 per cent. till date of payment. As the appeal only succeeds in part, we think the parties should bear their own costs in this Court. The appellant will be entitled to proportionate costs in the trial Court.

Nos. 46 to 51 of 1935 : The judgment in these appeals must be read in conjunction with the judgment which we have delivered in C. C. C. A. No. 45 of 1935. These cases were tried together in the Court below and the appeals have been heard together with C. C. C. A. No. 45 of 1935. The facts differ slightly from the facts of that appeal. The appellants in these appeals did not signify their acceptance of the deed of composition until after the trustee had distributed the whole of the money received by him from respondent 2 under the deed of composition. Therefore the appellants have no case against respondent 1, and the appeals must be dismissed with costs in favour of respondent 1.

B. Sitarama Rao and P. Govinda Menon — for Respondents.

Venkatasubba Rao J. — We think it unnecessary to restate the facts of this case in any detail, as they have been fully set out in the judgment under appeal. The suit has been filed by the karnavan of the Kodoth tarwad, said to be a well-known and wealthy tarwad in South Kanara District. The object of the suit was to have it declared that the acquisitions made by four individuals, Kunhi Kanna Nair, Kunhi Kora Nair, Pathali Kanna Nair and Ukkoman Nair belonged to the entire tarwad, of which the plaintiff is the karnavan. This tarwad consisted of three tavazhies and the four persons named above belonged to the tavazhi known as Pattinhara Veddu. The lower Court has held that it is unnecessary to decide whether the ownership of the properties claimed originally vested in the four individuals or in their tavazhi, for, according to the learned Judge, granting that at their inceptions the acquisitions had been made for the benefit of the four members, their interest was subsequently validly conveyed to the entire tavazhi. The plaintiff's claim that the properties should be deemed to have been acquired for the benefit of the tarwad was negatived by the lower Court. This finding coupled with its other conclusion already referred to, namely that the tavazhi became the ultimate owner of the properties in question, led to the dismissal of the suit.

As we substantially agree both with the conclusions of the learned Judge and his reasons in support thereof we propose to deal with the appeal very briefly. It is common ground that although the suit relates to several acquisitions, the most important of them were those made about the years 1878 and 1880; it was with the income derived from these acquisitions, that the other properties in the suit were acquired. The question therefore to be decided is for whose benefit or in what circumstances were the acquisitions of 1878 and 1880 made? Mr. Venkatarama Sastri for the appellants takes his stand on the finding of the lower Court, that the tarwad as a whole was possessed of considerable property, whereas the tavazhi in question was not shown to have had separate funds worth the name of its own. This being so, he contends that it should be assumed that the acquisitions made by the members of this tavazhi must have been made with the aid of the funds belonging to the tarwad. In addition, he relies on the circumstance that the person, who in the crucial years had the control of the tarwad property, was its karnavan Ambu Nair, who also happened to be the senior most member of the tavazhi in question. His contention is that Ambu Nair, with a view to benefit his own tavazhi at the expense of the main tarwad, acquired properties in the names of the junior members of the branch, thus defrauding the tarwad, whose interests it was his duty to safeguard. As we have said, we do not wish to repeat the arguments of the lower Court, but it seems to us that this contention of the learned counsel ought not to be allowed to prevail. Ambu Nair, the person already referred to, was the karnavan from 1873 to 1881. His successor was one Kora Nair, who was the karnavan for 20 years (1881 to 1901) and he was in turn succeeded by Kamaran Nair, whose karnavanship extended over 10 years (1901 to 1911). What is most significant is that neither of these two last-mentioned karnavan belonged to the Pattinhara tavazhi and yet they took no steps whatever to challenge the acquisitions in question during the three decades they were in office. Of the four individuals referred to above, Kunhi Kannan Nair died in 1903 and the other three either in 1923 or in 1924. The plaintiff, who likewise belonged to a different tavazhi, became the karnavan in 1911 and the transactions in question were not challenged till all the four members had died. In 1924, after the death of the last survivor, there were mutation proceedings and it was then for the first time that the plaintiff chose to challenge the transactions. Even then the case he put forward was not that the acquisitions were made on behalf of the tarwad, but that on the death of the four members who made the acquisitions, the properties lapsed to the tarwad under the Marumakathayam law. Further, in 1923, there was a suit filed, the parties to which were the members of the Pattinhara tavazhi and the question was there raised, were the properties the acquisitions of the individual members or did they belong to the tavazhi as a whole? That suit ended in a compromise which declared that the properties belonged to the tavazhi; in other words, there was a relinquishment in virtue of that compromise of the rights, if any, of the individual members. It is incredible that the other tavazhies were not aware of this proceeding, and if the properties did in fact belong to the tarwad as is now suggested, it is difficult to believe that no claim to that effect would then have been put forward. What then is the natural inference from this long and uniform conduct? The several karnavans that succeeded Ambu Nair acquiesced in the properties being treated as not belonging to the tarwad. Is it proper to allow the plaintiff to re-open the transactions which were acquiesced in by his predecessors and which he himself did not choose to impeach till all the persons connected with the acquisitions had died and all the evidence had disappeared? We therefore agreeing with the lower Court hold that his acquisitions were not made on behalf of or for the benefit of the tarwad.

It is not contended for the appellants that if the ownership vested in the four individual members, the properties would on their death lapse to the tarwad and not to the tavazhi. That this would be the correct position in law, is not disputed. But the question is granting that the properties originally belonged to the individual members, did or did they not become, by virtue of the compromise, the properties of the tavazhi? In the lower Court, it was strenuously argued and it was feebly suggested here that a tavazhi as a legal entity can have no existence and can acquire no properties as such. We agree with the learned Subordinate Judge that this contention is untenable. In 51 Mad 574,[1] it has been held that a tavazhi consisting of a female and her descendants in the female line as a sub-division of a tarwad is a legal entity, capable of holding properties as a distinct unit. That the properties could be relinquished in favour of the tavazhi in question, can therefore admit of no doubt. The question then remains was there a valid relinquishment in favour of the tavazhi, granting that the properties did in fact belong to the individual members in whose names the acquisitions had been made? The suit which ended in the compromise to which we have referred, did not embrace all the properties in dispute and if the amended provision now in force of the Registration Act applies, there can be no question that the compromise decree not having been registered cannot affect such of the properties as were extraneous to the suit. But Mr. Venkatarama Sastri contends that even under the old provision, the compromise decree could not be received in evidence to show a completed transfer. In other words, he argues that the effect of the pronouncement of the Judicial Committee in 46 I A 240=47 Cal 485[2] is that the compromise decree could be used as evidence to prove the agreement to convey and not the completed conveyance. The next step in his argument is that in the present case the agreement, which alone was proved, has not been followed by an out and out relinquishment. This argument proceeds upon an entire misreading of the Privy Council decision. Their Lordships observe :

> It may be that as a decree it was incapable of being executed outside the lands of the suit, but that does not prevent it being received in evidence of its contents (p. 246).

Then they go on to say, referring to the word "decree" in S. 17 (2) (vi), Registration Act :

> There is therefore no reason why a limit should be imposed upon the meaning of the word so as to confine it to the operative portion only of the decree (p. 247).

These observations make it perfectly clear that an unregistered decree could under the old provision be received in evidence of its "contents" there being no suggestion whatever, that although the decree refers to an out and out conveyance, it can be used for a limited purpose only, that of proving an agreement to convey. This is also the effect of 43 Mad 688[3] and 68 M L J 41,[4] which have considered the Privy Council decision. We therefore agreeing with the lower Court hold that there was a valid relinquishment in favour of the tavazhi of such rights as the members possessed and that the doctrine of lapse contended for can have no application. We have now disposed of the properties covered by Schs. A to C. As to the property in Sch. D, the lower Court has disallowed the defendants' claim to improvements, and the correctness of this conclusion has not been attacked by the respondents. The lower Court has however refused to grant a declaration in respect of this property in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that the tarwad's title had never been questioned previous to the suit. We think in the circumstances, the lower Court ought to have granted a declaration in respect of the Sch. D property, and Mr. Sitarama Rao, the respondents' learned counsel, does not dispute this.

In the result, the lower Court's decree dismissing the suit in regard to the properties in Schs. A to C is confirmed. As regards the Sch. D property, we grant a declaration in favour of the appellants and to that extent the lower Court's decree is varied. In view of this modification of the decree, we direct the appellants to pay

v.

Muhammad Naina Maracair and others — Respondents.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 902 of 1937, Decided on 7th September 1937, from order of Dist. Court, South Arcot, D/- 1st May 1937.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), Sch. 2, Para. 18—Provisions are mandatory—Petition for stay filed after three years from suit and at instance of Court—Provisions of Para. 18 are not complied with.

The wording of Para. 18, Sch. 2 as well as of S. 22, is clearly mandatory. It is clearly beyond the powers of a Court to treat some laws of the Legislature as being less binding on them than others. [P 205 C 2; P 206 C 1]

Where therefore the petition for stay is filed after three years from the filing of the suit, and that too at the instance of the Court and after the issues are framed, the provisions of Para. 18, Sch. 2, are not complied with : A I R 1925 Lah 175 and A I R 1925 Lah 322, Rel. on. [P 206 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), Sch. 2, Para. 18—Agreement to arbitrate.

An agreement to arbitrate does not by itself operate as a stay of suit. [P 206 C 1]

 (c) Civil P. C. (1908), Sch. 2, para. 18—Stay of suit—Stay should not be "sine die"—Court must exercise its control over arbitration proceedings — Court should see that delay is avoided.

Where a Court adjourns a case under Para. 18, Sch. 2, the case should not be adjourned "sine die". The Court ought not to renounce its powers and duties in disposing of a suit, and it is bound to exercise as much control as it can over the proceeding before the arbitrator. It is the duty of the Court to see that the parties do not delay the disposal of the arbitration proceedings and to see that as far as possible they prosecute those proceedings. [P 206 C 2]

Order.—The defendants in their written statement in this suit raised various defences and one of them was that the plaintiffs had agreed to submit their case to arbitration. Various issues were framed, one of which was whether the Court had jurisdiction. That issue and another were heard nearly three years later; and on the last day of arguments on these issues the Court drew the attention of the vakil for the defendants to the fact that he should, under Para. 18, Sch. 2, Civil P. C., have put in an application for a stay. The defendants' vakil acted on this and filed a petition; but even then, the petition did not contain some of the necessary elements and it had to be amended. Orders were then passed granting stay of the suit to permit the parties having recourse to arbitration. In the first instance, a stay for six months was granted and later the suit was adjourned sine die. An appeal was filed to the District Court, which upheld the orders of the Subordinate Judge. In revision it is urged that the Subordinate Judge acted illegally in granting stay at such a late stage of the proceedings; for the provision of Para. 18, Sch. 2, like those of S. 22, Civil P. C., requires an application at the earliest possible opportunity or at or before the framing of issues if stay is to be granted.

The Courts below seem to be of opinion that this objection of the plaintiffs was a highly technical one and one that should not be allowed to prevail. Certain cases were quoted before them; but they came to the conclusion that although there was no ambiguity in the language of Para. 18, Sch. 2, yet it did not appear probable that Para. 18 intended to lay down any rigid rule. Reference was made to 46 Cal 1041,[1] where it was only in the High Court in appeal that an objection was raised that no application for stay had been put in. In that case, not only had one side failed to put in an application for stay, but the other side had failed to take any objection to the proceedings on that ground; and so the Calcutta High Court thought that the best procedure to adopt was to remand the suit to the stage of framing issues, so that the trial Court could consider the merits of an application for stay. I do not think there is anything in this case which suggests that the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court who heard that appeal thought that the provisions of Para. 18, Sch. 2 were not mandatory. The wording of Para. 18, as well as of S. 22, Civil P. C., is clearly mandatory and if any authority were needed for that position, it is found in A I R 1925 Lah 175[2] and A I R 1925 Lah 322.[3] The suit was filed in August 1933 and issues were framed on 5th December 1933. The petition for stay, far from being filed at the earliest opportunity was put in only at the instance of the Court on 11th September 1936. It cannot therefore be said that the provisions of Para. 18, Sch. 2 were complied with; and I think the lower Courts were wrong in treating the provisions of this paragraph so lightly. It is clearly beyond the powers of a Court to treat some laws of the Legislature as being less binding on them than others. It is however argued that although the defendants did not put in a regular petition for stay, Para. 6 of the written statement is tantamount to an application for stay. Paragraph 6 runs as follows :

> This defendant submits that the suit is barred by article 14 of the agreement of partnership, whereby all the parties are bound to appoint arbitrators in accordance with Art. 119, Civil P. C., in force at Padang for the purpose of settling the accounts and distributing the shares. This defendant specifically called upon the plaintiffs to act in accordance with the said provision and not to rush to Court with a suit for accounts. The said clause is further evidence of the intention of the parties to be bound only by the authority and jurisdiction of the Courts at Padang.

Clearly, this paragraph was intended to be one of the many defences set up by the defendants to the plaintiff's suit and the final prayer was that the suit should be dismissed. Para. 6 cannot therefore in itself be interpreted as an application for stay. It is however possible to argue that if this defence were accepted, the Court could not go on with the suit, but would be obliged, if it thought that the matter should be referred to arbitration because the parties had contracted to do so, to stay the suit; and that although no application for stay was specifically made, yet the consequence of this defence was that the suit should be stayed. This argument was one that ought not, I think, to be accepted; for, upon the filing of a suit, the power of the parties to refer the matter to arbitration ends; and as Para. 18 of Sch. 2 itself shows an agreement to arbitrate does not operate as a stay of suit. Nevertheless, sitting in revision, I am reluctant to interfere, because substantial justice has been done by the Courts. It seems eminently desirable that as the parties had contracted to arbitrate they should be compelled to do so. The plaintiffs filed no reply to the written statement of the defendants; and until the situation had been cleared by arguments on the preliminary issues and by a decision by the Court on those points, it was not easy to say what the next step in the proceedings for the disposal of the dispute between the parties was to be.

I cannot however agree with the learned Subordinate Judge that the proper order to pass is 'adjourned sine die'. Clearly the Court ought not to renounce its powers and its duties in the disposing of the suit; and it is bound to exercise as much control as it can over the proceedings before the arbitrator. It is the duty of the Court to see that the parties do not delay the disposal of the arbitration proceedings and to see that as far as possible they prosecute those proceedings. I would therefore modify the order of the Subordinate Judge by granting an adjournment for one year from the last order of adjournment instead of sine die. It will then be open to the Subordinate Judge to adjourn the case to such further date as he thinks necessary, if the parties have done all that they could to further the disposal of their dispute before the arbitration tribunal. Although the Courts below have not done any injustice to the parties, they have passed an order which is technically wrong. I therefore order both sides to bear their own costs in regard to this petition for stay in all three Courts.

PANDRANG RAO AND VENKATARAMANA RAO JJ.

M. & S. M. Railway Co., Ltd. — Appellants.

v.

Garimella Satyanarayana and Sons and others — Respondents.

Appeals Nos. 347 and 348 of 1931 and Civil Revn. Petns. Nos. 463 to 471 of 1931, Decided on 5th August 1937, against decrees of Sub-Judge, Narasapur, D/. 30th June 1930.

Railways Act (1890), S. 72 — Burden of proof—Risk note form B—Liability of railway—Non-delivery of entire goods—Railway must account for dealing with goods during all period while under its control—Evidence adduced should be such as would avoid all adverse inference.

Under the risk note Form B no doubt the Railway Company is freed from all responsibility for any loss of the consignment arising from any cause whatever except upon proof that such loss arose from the misconduct of the railway administration's servants. But under the proviso to the risk note, in the case of non-delivery of the whole consignment where such non-delivery is not due to accidents to trains or to fire, the railway administration is bound to disclose to the consignor how the consignment was dealt with throughout the time it was in their possession or control and to give evidence in respect thereof and if misconduct on the part of the railway administration cannot be inferred from such evidence then only the burden of proof is shifted to the consignor. The evidence must be all the evidence which the railway administration considers desirable to avoid a fair inference of misconduct keeping in mind the provisions of S. 114, Evidence Act. Hence a Railway Company will be liable if they fail to account as to how the consignment was dealt with or from the evidence adduced in regard thereto an inference of misconduct can be presumed or if misconduct is proved : *A I R 1937 P C 152, Rel. on. P. Somasundaram — for Appellants.

G. Lakshmanna and G. Chandrasekara Sastry — for Respondents.

Appeals Nos. 347 and 348 of 1931.

Venkataramana Rao J. — These two appeals arise out of two suits brought for the recovery of damages for non-delivery of the goods entrusted to defendant 1, the M. & S. M. Railway Company, through defendant 2, their out-agency contractor. Both the receipt of the goods and non-delivery are admitted. The Railway Company sought to escape from their obligation by relying upon the risk note form B in pursuance of which the goods were entrusted to them for carriage. They pleaded that the goods were lost by fire while they were kept in a shed near the Nidadavole Railway Station and therefore they were not guilty of any misconduct and that unless misconduct is proved against them they cannot be rendered liable. The learned Subordinate Judge found that the Railway Company failed to prove that the goods were lost by fire. He came to the said conclusion on a consideration of both the oral and documentary evidence in the case. Mr. Somasundaram sought to canvass that finding before us. We have gone through the said evidence and we see no reason to disturb the said finding. Only three witnesses were examined in support of the alleged loss by fire. They are D. W. 2, D. W. 3 and D. W. 5. The specific case sought to be proved through the said oral testimony is that the goods were sent from Palacole where they were entrusted to defendant 2's agent on or about 23rd January 1928 to Nidadavolu for entrainment and for three days they were taken to the railway station but on account of the non-availability of wagons, they could not be booked and they were brought back to the shed and kept there till the night of 16th February 1928 on which night there was a fire and the goods were lost. D. W. 5 does not know anything personally about the storage of the goods. D. W. 2 is the booking clerk of defendant 2. He is unable to state on what dates the goods were taken to the railway station and brought back. All that he says in his evidence is that the goods were put in the shed but he does not say when. He does not further say that the goods were continued to be kept there until 6th February and were in the shed when the fire occurred. D. W. 3 is a night watchman who is said to have watched the shed on the night when the fire occurred but he does not know specifically about the existence of these goods in the shed that night. He says that there is a second watchman whose business was to check the bundles but that second watchman has not been called and that there is no evidence that these goods were checked on the 6th and were found to be existing there before the fire occurred. There is no documentary evidence produced in support of the fact that these goods were there that night. It is alleged that the registers which might have thrown light on this fact were destroyed, but the evidence shows that the registers were being kept in a box and there is nothing to show that the box itself was destroyed. No doubt, Mr. Somasundaram relied upon a telegram alleged to have been sent immediately after the occurrence and a report made by defendant 2 to defendant 1 to the effect that 35 cloth bundles were destroyed by fire. It is interested testimony on which no Court could act.

The learned Subordinate Judge taking all these circumstances into consideration came to the conclusion that the Railway Company failed to discharge the obligation which rested on them to prove that the goods were destroyed by fire. Mr. Somasundaram contended that the second witness having stated that the goods were taken back from the railway station to the shed, there is a presumption that the goods must have continued to remain in the shed. We do not think that there is any such presumption in law. There is evidence in the case that the shed was not kept locked or maintained in such a manner as to lead to the inference that the goods could not be lost except by fire. The way in which the shed was maintained may also lead to the conclusion that the goods might have been stolen. So under such circumstances we cannot say that the inference drawn by the lower Court is wrong.

The question now is, the Railway Company having failed to prove that the goods were lost by fire could they escape their obligation to compensate the plaintiffs for loss for non-delivery. Mr. Somasundaram contends that all they have to do is to allege some loss and adduce some evidence and it is incumbent upon the plaintiffs to allege and prove misconduct and for this he relies on the risk note. Under the risk note, no doubt, the Railway Company is freed from all responsibility for any loss of the consignment arising from any cause whatever except upon proof that such loss arose from the misconduct of the railway administration's servants. But there is a proviso which has been introduced recently and which considerably modifies the obligations of the Railway Company. Under the proviso, in the case of non-delivery of the whole consignment, where such non-delivery is not due to accidents to trains or to fire, the railway administration is bound to disclose to the consignor how the consignment was dealt with throughout the time it was in their possession or control and to give evidence in respect thereof and if misconduct on the part of the railway administration cannot be inferred from such evidence, then only the burden of proof is shifted to the consignor.

A similar risk note form B was the subject of interpretation before their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in a recent case in A I R 1937 P C 152.[1] Their Lordships clearly lay down there that there is a distinct obligation on the part of the Railway Company to give full disclosure of how the goods have been dealt with by giving necessary evidence and explain what that necessary evidence should be. The evidence according to their Lordships must be all the evidence which the railway administration considers desirable to avoid a fair inference of misconduct keeping in mind the provisions of S. 114, Evidence Act. In view of this recent pronouncement, it is clear that a railway company will be liable if they fail to account as to how the consignment was dealt with or from the evidence adduced in regard thereto an inference of misconduct can be presumed or if misconduct is proved. The loss by fire in this case has been relied upon by the Railway Company for two reasons: (1) to escape the obligation imposed upon them by proviso and (2) to show how the consignment was dealt with. Now the finding is that the Railway Company has failed to satisfactorily establish that the goods were lost by fire. From this it follows that they have failed to account as to how they dealt with the goods during the time they were in their possession and control, and as observed by their Lordships in the said case, if the administration fails to take the opportunity to satisfy the demands of the consignor to fulfil their obligation of disclosure so far as endorsed by the Court, they will be in breach of their contractual obligation of disclosure. Therefore having failed to account for the loss of the goods and for the non-delivery thereof, the Railway Company is liable.

The decision of the lower Court awarding damages is therefore correct. Mr. Somasundaram objects to the award of interest from the date when the loss is alleged to have occurred. We think that the lower Court is not right in giving interest on damages from the date of the alleged loss. We therefore modify the decree of the lower Court by awarding interest at 6% on the amount of damages awarded from the date of the plaint. In other respects the decrees of the lower Court are confirmed and the appeals are dismissed with costs. With regard to the memorandum of objections in Appeal No. 347/31, we think Mr. Lakshmanna is right in his contention in regard to the costs allowed to defendant 2 and we allow the appeal in regard thereto as we think that the award of costs is not justified.

Board of Commissioners for Hindu Religious Endowments, Madras — Respondent.

Appeal No. 356 and Civil Revn. Petn. No. 1426 of 1930, Decided on 3rd September 1937, against order of Dist. Court, South Malabar, in O. P. No. 127 of 1928.

Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act (2 of 1927), S. 9 (12)—Question of intention to dedicate place for public use or of user by public as of right is necessarily matter for inference—Inference that institution must have been dedicated for use by public when can be drawn stated.

According to the definition of "temple" in S. 9 (12), the user by the public for the purpose of religious worship has to be proved as a fact. The question of intention to dedicate the place for the use of the public or of the user by the public being as of right, is necessarily a matter for inference from the nature of the institution, the nature of the user and the way the institution has been administered. Once a long course of user by the public for the purpose of worship is established and the fact of a separate endowment in trust for the deity is also proved, it is fair to infer that the institution must have been dedicated for use by the public (unless the contrary is established)—particularly when the character of the temple, its construction, the arrangement of the various parts of the temple and the nature of the deities installed there are similar to what obtains in admittedly public temples. Similarly, when user by the public generally to the extent to which there is a worshipping public in the locality is established, it is not unreasonable to presume that the user by the public was as of right, unless there are circumstances clearly suggesting that the user must have been permissive or that the authorities in charge of the temple have exercised such arbitrary power of exclusion that it can only be ascribed to the private character of the institution : A I R 1934 P C 230 and A I R 1920 Mad 42, Ref. [P 210 C 1, 2]

K. Subba Rao — for Respondent.

Varadachariar J.—By an order dated 3rd February 1936, we directed the trial Court to receive such additional evidence as the parties may tender as we were inclined to think that on account of some misapprehension, the whole available evidence had not been placed before the Court on the previous occasion. The learned District Judge has now admitted such evidence as the petitioner adduced, but as he thought that the additional evidence did not affect the substance of the previous judgment, he has stated that he considers it unnecessary to record a fresh finding. The additional evidence has not carried the petitioner very far. Part of it only serves to establish that the petitioner's family which is now living far away from the temple in question was at one time living within ¾ mile or a mile of the temple. Reliance has been placed on behalf of the petitioner on certain statements in the report of a Commissioner who was appointed by the lower Court to inspect the locality and make a report. It appears from that report that there is no regular foot path from the public road to the temple and there are no shops or bazars in the neighbourhood where worshippers can have the usual and ordinary facilities for making purchase for offerings and so on. The situation of the temple and the facilities for approach to the temple may have a bearing on the question whether in fact the public do go and worship at the place or not; but, as the learned Judge has found even on the former occasion on the evidence of the petitioners' witnesses themselves that such public as is available in the locality is in the habit of worshipping in the temple. These remarks in the Commissioner's report about the nature of the locality or the access available to the temple do not help us to come to one conclusion rather than to another. It must be remembered that the appeal itself is incompetent and that we can deal with the matter only under S. 115, Civil P. C. If the additional evidence had showed that any points of substantial importance were not before the Court on the previous occasion, there might be justification for our setting aside the previous finding and dealing with the case ourselves or asking for a revised finding. We are unable to say that the additional evidence is of such a character.

Mr. Ramakrishna Iyer, the learned counsel for the petitioner, has insisted that the judgment of the learned District Judge contains a number of material errors and as these errors must have vitiated the conclusion then arrived at, it is proper that we should either deal with the evidence ourselves or call for a revised finding. Two errors to which special reference may be made are (1) the statement in para. 4 of the judgment that the temple which adjoins the petitioners' mana in Vadanakurissi is a Siva temple and (2) the statement in para. 9 of the judgment about the contents of a former judgment of 1871. Mr. Ramakrishna Iyer is right in pointing out that the evidence shows that the temple which adjoins the mana is a Vishnu temple and not a Siva temple; and there is also some justification for his criticism of the way in which the learned Judge read some of the observations in the judgement of 1871. But we are not satisfied that these errors are so substantial as to justify our setting aside the learned Judge's finding.

Mr Ramakrishna Iyer made a complaint that the learned Judge acted upon a presumption that temples in Malabar are public temples until the contrary is proved and he invited our attention to the judgment of the Privy Council in 67 M L J 788,[1] as negativing such a presumption. We do not think that the learned Judge lays it down as any legal presumption. Having regard to the observations which he quotes from Sadasiva Iyer's judgment in 54 I C 177,[2] he seems to have thought that if a temple possessed certain characteristics it is only fair to presume even in Malabar that it is a public temple till the contrary is proved. S 9 (12), Hindu Religious Endowments Act lays down that a "temple" (for the purpose of the Act) means a place used as a place of public religious worship and dedicated to, or for the benefit of, or used as of right by the Hindu community, or any section thereof as a place of religious worship. According to this definition, the user by the public for the purpose of religious worship has to be proved as a fact. The question of intention to dedicate the place for the use of the public or of the user by the public being as of right is necessarily a matter for inference from the nature of the institution and the nature of the user and the way the institution has been administered. In the case already referred to, their Lordships of the Privy Council lay stress upon the fact of the temple having been used as a place of public religious worship, though they observe that if there had been sufficient reason for holding that the temple and its endowment were originally dedicated for the tarwad and were private trusts, their Lordships would have been slow to hold that the admission of the public in later times would affect the private character of the trusts. This observation suggests that once a long course of user by the public for the purpose of worship is established, and the fact of a separate endowment in trust for the deity is also proved, it is fair to infer that the institution must have been dedicated for user by the public (unless the contrary is established) — particularly when the character of the temple, its construction, the arrangement of the various parts of the temple and the nature of the deities installed there are similar to what obtains in admittedly public temples. Similarly, when user by the public generally to the extent to which there is a worshipping public in the locality is established, it is not unreasonable to presume that the user by the public was as of right, unless there are circumstances clearly suggesting that the user must have been permissive or that the authorities in charge of the temple have exercised such arbitrary power of exclusion that it can only be ascribed to the private character of the institution.

A point was made by Mr. Ramakrishna Iyer that the learned Judge has referred to only one instance of exclusion in this case whereas the evidence establishes two such instances. We are not sure that the evidence as to the other is so clear that the learned Judge was not justified in ignoring it. But even taking it to be otherwise, the exclusion is clearly the result of personal ill-will and can scarcely be regarded as indicating the exercise of a general right of exclusion at the choice of the Uralan. The result is that both the appeal and the revision petition must be dismissed with costs in the appeal including the costs of the additional evidence enquiry.

C.R.K./S.C. Appeal and revision dismissed.

Taluk Board of Aruppukottai — Respondent.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 944 of 1934, Decided on 29th January 1937, from decree of Sub-Judge, Devakottai, in A. S. No. 37 of 1933.

Madras Local Boards Act (1920 as amended by Act 11 of 1930), Sch. 4, Rr. 11 and 11-A (5) —President calling on profession tax assessee by notice to produce accounts and assessing profession tax on arbitrary basis—Levy of tax held illegal.

Where on evidence it was found that a President of a Taluk Board called on a profession tax assessee by a notice to produce his accounts which he had no power to call for under Cl. (5) of R. 11-A, that the assessee was assessed to income-tax and that the President assessed the profession tax on an arbitrary basis:

Held that the levy of tax was illegal as provisions of R. 11-A were not complied with and as it was ultra vires of the Local Boards to adopt a basis different from that specified in the Act and the rules framed thereunder and as the President of the Taluk Board had disregarded the provisions of R. 11 of Sch. 4 : 27 Mad 647, Rel. on.

Order.—The question in this civil revision petition relates to the legality of the profession-tax levied on the petitioner for two half years, i. e. the half year ending 30th September 1930 and the half year ending 31st March 1931, by the Taluk Board of Aruppukottai in Ramnad District. The amount levied was Rs. 100 for each half year; notices of demand were served on the petitioner for each half year's levy. He failed to prefer an appeal soon after the service of notice with reference to the half year ending 30th September 1930, but he did it only after the service of notice with reference to the second half year, for both half years after paying the taxes levied. The appeal was filed on 11th May 1931, the date of service of notice being 10th April 1931 and 10th May being a Sunday. The President of the Taluk Board rejected the appeal as time-barred without placing the memorandum of appeal before the Board as he was bound to do. This action of the President is not justified before me; the levy is impeached as not being in accordance with the provisions of the Local Boards Act and the rules framed thereunder.

Two main grounds are alleged, namely : (i) No notice was served on the petitioner calling on him to furnish a return as required by R. 11-A of Sch 4, Madras Local Boards Act, as amended by the Madras Act 11 of 1930. (ii) The basis of taxation is wrong as being in contravention of R. 11 of Sch. 4 of the said Act. The learned District Munsif, who tried the suit, found that no notice under R. 11-A was served and that no evidence was adduced by the Taluk Board to prove that such a notice was served. The learned Subordinate Judge did not specifically give a finding in regard thereto, but only observed that the plaintiff admitted that a notice was given. On a reference to the plaintiff's evidence, it will be seen that notice was given to him to produce his accounts, which the President had no power to call for under Cl. (5) of R. 11-A. Therefore it must be taken that the provisions of R. 11-A were not complied with. It is not disputed that the said Rule would be applicable to the case but for a Government notification to which I shall presently refer. Prima facie the levy would be illegal; so found the learned District Munsif. But, the levy was sought to be justified in appeal on the ground that the Taluk Board was not bound to give a notice under R. 11-A, having regard to the Government Notification issued on 6th October 1931 long after the levy. This contention prevailed with the Subordinate Judge, who reversed the decision of the District Munsif. The said notification runs thus :

In exercise of the powers conferred by S. 179, Madras District Municipalities Act, R. 12 of the schedule to the Madras Local Boards (Amendment Act 1930 (Madras 10 of 1930) (Amendment) Act of 1930 (Madras Act 11 of 1930) Governor acting with Ministers is hereby pleased notwithstanding anything contained in the said Act, to direct that Chairman of Municipal Councils, Presidents of Panchayats shall have power and shall be deemed to have had power until 30th September 1931 to levy profession-tax on companies and persons in respect of the half years ending 31st March 1931 and 30th September 1931 respectively, without serving the notice required by sub-r. (1) of R. 10 or 11-A of Sch. 4 to the Madras Dis. Municipalities Act, 1920 (5 of 1920)

Madras Local Boards Act (Act 14 of 1920).

This Notification purports to have been issued under R. 12 of the transitory provisions of Madras Act 11 of 1930. The said Rule is to this effect :

If any difficulty arises as to the first constitution or reconstitution of any Local Board after the commencement of this Act or otherwise in first giving effect to the provisions of this Act or of the said Act as amended by this Act the Local Government, as occasion may require, may by order do anything which appears to them necessary for the purpose of removing the difficulty.

Prima facie the Notification cannot apply to the half year ending 30th September 1930. In regard to the half year ending 31st March 1931, it is extremely doubtful if Rule 12 could empower the Government to issue the Notification in question. Assuming however that the Government had the power to do so, it seems to me that the basis of taxation indicated in R. 11 should be followed. Rule 11 clearly says that "the income shall be deemed to be" on a certain basis and in the case of a person assessed to income-tax for the year comprising the half year in question, "one half of the amount at which the profits and gains" of the business or the person against whom the levy is sought to be made "are computed under S. 10, Income-tax Act, 1922 for the purpose of assessing the income-tax". It is not disputed that the petitioner was assessed to income-tax for the year 1930-1931 (vide Ex. A.1). The Taluk Board must therefore be deemed to have disregarded the basis enjoined on them under the Act and the Rules. It is well settled that where a Local Board empowered to levy a tax adopts a basis different from that specified by the Act, which gives them the power, the levy is ultra vires: Vide 27 Mad 547.[1] The levy is thus illegal in this case. I therefore reverse the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge and restore that of the District Munsif. I direct each party to bear his or their own costs throughout.

Appeal No. 142 of 1932, Decided on 10th September 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Ramnad at Madura, in O. S. No. 26 of 1931.

Mortgage — Costs — Mortgage suit against mortgagor, puisne mortgagees, and purchaser of equity of redemption—Mortgagor denying liability and remaining ex parte — Other defendants contesting suit — Decree for personal liability for costs held could be passed against mortgagor as well as other defendants.

In a mortgage suit against the mortgagor, the puisne mortgagees, and the purchaser of equity of redemption, the mortgagor denied his liability and remained ex parte. In his absence, the other defendants, some doing the spade work of the cross-examination and leading evidence while others supporting them contested the suit:

Held that a decree for personal liability for costs could be passed against the mortgagor as well as the other defendants. Moreover, no distinction should be made between the defendants doing the spade work of cross-examination etc., and others who supported them. [P 213 C 1]

K. Balasubramania Iyer — for Appellants.

P. S. Narayanaswamy Iyer — for Respondent.

Judgment.—In this mortgage suit defendant 1 was the mortgagor; defendants 2 and 3 were puisne mortgagees; defendant 4 was the purchaser of the equity of redemption of the greater number of the items mortgaged; and defendant 7 was the purchaser of one item. Defendant 1 filed a written statement denying his liability and then remained ex parte. The other defendants mentioned above supported the written statement of defendant 1. Defendant 3 made a special claim to priority and defendant 7 raised a number of pleas in connection with the item of property that he had purchased. In the decree in the suit the lower Court made defendants 1, 2, 3, 4, and 7 all personally liable for costs on the ground that defendants 2 to 4 and 7 supported defendant 1 in resisting the plaintiff's claim. Defendants 2 to 4 and 7 appeal against the decree for costs.

It has been argued that in a mortgage suit no person but the mortgagor can be made personally liable for costs. If that contention were correct, it would lead to very anomalous results, as the mortgagor might admit the plaintiff's claim and all the resistance come from the other parties to the suit, who would not, if this argument were correct, be liable for costs at all. 29 M L J 120[1] has been quoted as an authority for this peculiar position. That was also a mortgage suit; but the decree contained a declaration of the personal liability of defendant 2 (who was not the mortgagor) for the plaintiffs' costs in case the sale proceeds were not sufficient to pay them as well as the mortgage money. The argument was there accepted that O. 34, R. 6, Civil P. C., which relates to the recovery of any balance due on a mortgage after the sale, does not make any provision for recovery from any person personally other than the mortgagor, because the word "defendant" in R. 6 means only the mortgagor. It was a purely technical argument and it turned on the interpretation of R. 6. In the present case however, there is no need for recourse to R. 6; and no reason has been given why the Court in the exercise of its usual discretion with regard to costs cannot make any person who is a party to the suit liable for a part or the whole of the costs.

Although it appears from the record that it was defendant 2's counsel who was responsible for most of the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses and for leading the evidence against the plaintiff, yet it is difficult to distinguish between the responsibilities of defendant 2 and the other appellants. It often happens that a particular defendant's counsel cross-examines the witnesses; and if his cross-examination is sufficient, there is no necessity for further cross-examination by the counsel for the other defendants. Similarly, one defendant, upon whose peculiar knowledge of the facts the defendants rely may lead evidence; but if it appears that the other defendants are supporting the defendant who is doing the spade work on behalf of all of them, there is no reason or equity why those other defendants should not be as fully liable for costs as the defendant whose counsel is responsible for most of the cross-examination and for the leading of the evidence on behalf of the defendants. I therefore find myself unable to agree that some distinction should have been made by the lower Court between the case of defendant 2 and those of the remaining appellants.

It is further argued that in any event the appellants ought not to have been saddled with the costs of the institution of the suit—the argument being that in any event, it was necessary to institute a suit and to pay the necessary costs of institution viz. court fee, vakalat fee, and so on, and that the fact that the appellants intervened and opposed the granting of the decree would at the most only make them liable for such costs as might have been incurred after the institution of the suit. There is no doubt some force in this argument; but when another defendant so completely identifies himself with mortgagor and, as in this case, goes to the extent of opposing the grant of the decree even when the mortgagor was ex parte, it is difficult to hold that the trial Court is not justified in declaring that those defendants who opposed the suit should be as fully liable for costs as the mortgagor himself. I do not therefore feel justified in interfering with the discretion of the trial Court in the matter of costs. The result is that this appeal is dismissed with costs.

Order.—This petition is not seriously opposed by the learned Public Prosecutor. All that has been proved is that the petitioners have committed certain acts of violence in the past. What must be proved in order to justify an order of this kind is that the petitioners are likely to break the peace in future. Does any occasion, does any cause of quarrel exist which is likely to cause them to break the peace? The learned Sessions Judge has not found that any exists. He disbelieves the main feature of the prosecution that the petitioners formed a compact with the object of using force in agitating against the landlords.

In these circumstances, it is not enough for the learned Sessions Judge merely to say that he thinks that men who have been violent once will be violent again :

President of Board of Commissioners for Hindu Religious Endowments, Madras — Respondent.

Appeal No. 217 and Civil Revn. Petn. No. 1306 of 1932, Decided on 15th September 1937, to revise order of Dist. Court, Ganjam, D/. 18th December 1931.

(a) Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act (2 of 1927), S. 84—Appeal—Revision and not appeal lies from order under S. 84 (2).

No appeal lies against the decision of the District Judge upon an application under S. 84 but the matter can be dealt with by the High Court only under S. 115, Civil P. C. [P 214 C 1,2]

(b) Hindu Law — Religious Endowment—Private trust — Mere fact of admission of the public to temple does not affect private trust.

If originally the temple was dedicated for the use of the founder's family and was a private trust, the fact of the admission of the public to the temple later on would not of itself necessarily affect the private character of the trust: A I R 1934 P C 230, Foll. [P 214 C 2]

(c) Hindu Law — Religious endowment — Dedication — Dedication whether public or private trust must be determined independently of factum of dedication.

The dedication of property will no doubt impress the property with the character of trust but it may as well be a private trust as a public trust. The question whether the dedication was a public trust or not must be determined independently of the factum of the dedication of property. [P 214 C 2]

G. Lakshmana and G. Chandrasekhara Sastry — for Appellant.

P. V. Rajamanner — for Respondent.

Varadachariar J. — This appeal and the connected revision petition arise out of an application made to the District Judge of Ganjam under S. 84, Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act. The Board had held the temple in question to be a public temple and the petition was filed to have that declaration set aside. As it has been held that this Court can deal with this matter only under S. 115, Civil P. C. and that no appeal lies against the decision of the District Court on such applications, it is not open to us to review the learned Judge's findings of fact. But we cannot help thinking that in the present case, the conclusion of the learned District Judge has been arrived at on the basis of some erroneous assumption of law and without sufficient realisation of the importance of coming to a definite conclusion as to whether at one time the temple was a private temple or not.

We do not wish to say anything which will hamper the lower Court in coming to its own conclusion on remand. We wish to point out that in view of the considerations adverted to in the learned Judge's order as supporting the petitioner's contention that at the inception the temple might have been a private temple, the petitioner is entitled to invoke the aid of the observations of the Judicial Committee in 58 Mad 91[1] at p. 104, that if originally the temple was dedicated for the use of the founder's family and was a private trust, the fact of the admission of the public to the temple later on would not of itself necessarily affect the private character of the trust. It therefore seems proper that we should ask the learned District Judge to come to a definite conclusion on the question whether originally the temple was a private temple or not.

Again, the learned Judge seems to think that the fact of properties being endowed in trust for this temple in 1900 itself amounts to a dedication to a "public" purpose. This is not correct in law. The dedication of property will no doubt impress the property with the character of trust but it may as well be a private trust as a public trust. The question whether the dedication was a public trust or not must be determined independently of the factum of the dedication of property. The circumstance that similar language was used in other dedications made about the same time to a temple which is admittedly public does not seem to us relevant because in the latter case, it is the admitted public character of the temple in favour of which the endowment was made that makes the endowment public, and it will be begging the question to assume that in the present case also the endowment so made must have been for a public purpose.

It is difficult for us to say how far the final conclusion of the learned Judge has been influenced by errors and misconceptions on the above points. We therefore think it proper to set aside the learned Judge's order and remand the case to the lower Court to be disposed of in the light of the above observations. The appeal will be dismissed and the remand will be made in the revision petition. There will be no order as to costs in the appeal and the costs in the revision petition will abide the result.

Appeal No. 149 of 1934 and Civil Revn. Petn. No. 11 of 1933, Decided on 11th February 1937, against order of Small Cause Court, Trichinopoly, D/- 4-8-1934.

Civil P. C. (1908), Ss. 145, 47— Decree-holder seeking to make surety liable—Surety is entitled to raise objections to executability —Inquiry by Court into question raised between decree-holder and surety is one under S. 47 and is appealable—Provisions analogous to S. 145 apply in cases where S. 145 does not literally apply.

Section 145 puts the surety for the purpose of execution and of appeal on the same footing as an original party to the suit ; and if S. 145 and S. 47 be read together, then if the decree-holder seeks to make the surety liable, it is open to the surety to raise objections to executability, and the inquiry of the Court into the question raised between the decree-holder and the surety is one under S. 47 and is therefore appealable. Although S. 145 in terms applies only where the surety is personally liable yet if the sureties are made parties to the application to make them liable on a bond then they become parties as it were to the suit and can therefore be made liable in execution in any inquiry under S. 47. Although therefore S. 145 does not apply, provisions analogous to S. 145 would be applicable to a case to which S. 145 does not literally have any application.

A surety for the performance of a certain obligation by the receivers appointed by Court had deposited into Court money as security and he was not personally liable. Judgment.—Two parties claimed to be lessees of a tope under the respondent in this appeal and one of them brought a suit against the other for possession. During the pendency of that suit, as both parties were disputing possession, a receiver petition was put in, and the defendants in that suit, O. S. No. 18 of 1926, were appointed joint receivers upon their furnishing security for one year's estimated income, which amounted to Rs 1425. This security was to be either in cash or in immovable property. The appellant deposited in Court, Rs. 1425, for investment in the Co-operative Bank. Later, the lessor applied to be made a party and he was added. The matter was taken in revision to the High Court, which held that he was not a proper party to that suit, and that he should file a suit himself. He thereupon filed O. S. No. 87 of 1928 and made the lessees defendants. As the matter in dispute had to be fought out in O. S. No. 87 of 1928, O. S. No. 18 of 1926 was by agreement dismissed, both parties agreeing that the receiver should continue throughout the second suit. Eventually, the second suit, O. S. No. 87 of 1928, was decreed and the defendants to the first suit were found liable. The plaintiff in O. S. No. 87 of 1928 thereupon applied to draw from Court the money that had been deposited by the appellant. The District Munsif of Trichinopoly ordered the money to be paid over to the successful plaintiff in O. S. No. 87 of 1928. The surety thereupon filed an appeal to the Judge, Court of Small Causes, Trichinopoly, who held that an appeal did not lie. The present A. A. O. has been filed against the order of the Small Cause Judge, and the C. R. P. against the order of the District Munsif. The only question that has been argued in the appeal against appellate order is whether the learned Judge was right in holding that no appeal lay. The security bond runs thus :

So, in accordance with the said order, I have this day deposited (the amount) in this Court for a period of six months as surety for the same to be invested in the Trichinopoly Co-operative Urban Bank as fixed deposit for six months, the aforesaid deposit amount being Rs. 1425. This sum of rupees one thousand four hundred and twenty-five has been paid by me as security. If the plaintiff sustained any loss in the matter of rendering accounts to Court properly by defendants 1 and 2, I agree to the said loss having been adjusted out of the said security amount. If the plaintiff's suit is dismissed, and if defendants 1 and 2 should properly render accounts till the disposal of the suit and act justly, I alone shall receive the said amount with interest after this security bond having been cancelled.

It is argued on behalf of the respondent that the appellant was not a surety in the ordinary sense of the word. He deposited in Court a certain sum of money which was to be paid over to the plaintiff in case he sustained any loss on account of the receivership, and, it is suggested, the Court, having passed a decree against the defendants, could at once have ordered that this money be paid over to the plaintiff, and the petition for payment of money was not therefore in any sense an execution petition. I do not see why, because money has been deposited in Court, it is in a different position than if it had been deposited elsewhere, or if it had been in the custody of some other person or existed as some other form of property. It seems that the Court could not in its decree have straightway ordered the money in deposit to be paid over to the decree-holder; but in any case that was not done. The application put in after a decree was passed was that the money should be paid over to the decree-holder. It therefore seems that the appellant was in the same position as a surety who offered security of immovable or moveable property. S. 145 puts the surety for the purpose of execution and of appeal on the same footing as an original party to the suit; and if S. 145 and S. 47 be read together, then if the decree-holder seeks to make the surety liable, it is open to the surety to raise objections to executability, and the inquiry of the Court into the question raised between the decree-holder and the surety is one under S. 47 and is therefore appealable. S. 145 in terms applies only where the surety is personally liable; and it is therefore contended that as the surety in this case has deposited the money and that that money only is liable for the satisfaction of any loss that may have occurred, S. 145 does not apply to an agreement of this nature. A Bench of the Allahabad High Court in 45 All 649[1] at page 651, says :

> The personal or individual liability of the surety under the security bond may not always be as extensive as that of the judgment-debtor, and the object of the above provision clearly is to limit the enforcement to the extent provided for by the security bond.

I do not think however that their Lordships of the Privy Council in 42 All 158,[2] found that the surety who was not personally liable in the sense generally understood came under S. 145. Their Lordships appear to have taken it for granted that he did not. They found some difficulty in deciding what the remedy of a decree-holder against the surety was. They discussed the possibility of his bringing a suit under the Transfer of Property Act; and they found that that course was not open to him. They then say at p. 167 :

> It is suggested that they are bound to the Court but the Court is not a juridical person. It cannot be sued. It cannot take property, and as it cannot take property it cannot assign it. It remains therefore that here is an unquestioned liability, and there must be some mode of enforcing it and that the only mode of enforcing it must be by the Court making an order in the suit upon an application to which the sureties are parties, that the property charged be sold unless before a day named the sureties find the money, i.e. their Lordships think that if the sureties are made parties to the application to make them liable on a bond then they become parties as it were to the suit and can therefore be made liable in execution in any inquiry under S. 47. Although therefore they find that S. 145 does not apply, they would apply provisions analogous to S. 145 to a case to which S. 145 does not literally have any application. 42 All 158[2] was considered in 56 Mad 909.[3] Venkatasubba Rao J. says in a case where the surety had offered her immovable property as security :

> It is true that to the proceeding in question S. 145 does not apply, and we must regard that the order against the surety was made, not under the terms of that section, but under the general power which the Judicial Committee has held the Courts possess in regard to executing orders made against sureties.

In discussing whether an appeal lies he adds :

> But having regard to their Lordships' decision and the policy underlying S. 145, we must hold that it was not intended that the surety's rights should in this respect be abridged.

It is sought to distinguish this case by showing that the question there was whether the surety was a representative of a party to the suit; but even if she was, the reasoning applies equally well to a case where she is not, the principle underlying the decision being that even if S. 145 does not apply, the surety has an equal right of appeal. The learned advocate for the respondent seems to distinguish the position of the appellant from that of an ordinary surety by pointing out that he had not really offered his own money and that what he had deposited was the estimated value of the cocoanuts of the tope which he himself had purchased. Even if that were the case, it would only explain why he had offered himself as surety. His liability would be as a surety, though he had secured himself by purchasing in advance the cocoanuts. It has been suggested that as I have been taken through most of the important documents in the case, I might dispose of this matter myself; but it seems more satisfactory that the lower Appellate Court, which is the final Court of fact, should decide a matter in which questions of fact must of necessity arise. I do not think that the point raised is altogether a question of law. The second appeal is therefore allowed, and the first appeal remanded for disposal on the merits by the lower Appellate Court. The costs of this appeal will be costs of the first appeal.

C.R.P. No. 11 of 1933.—I have decided in C. M. S. A. No. 149 of 1934 that an appeal lay from the decision of the District Munsif. This petition is not therefore competent; but in view of the fact that it has been the contention of the respondent that no appeal lay, it is unnecessary for me to order any costs in dismissing the petition, except as to costs of printing, which will be paid to the respondent.

S. Sankaralingam Pillai — Respondent.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 345 of 1936, Decided on 24th September 1937, from order of Sub.Judge, Tuticorin, D/. 8th October 1935.

Decree—Ex parte—Setting aside — Order declaring party ex parte made and decree passed—Decree not appealed against within time—Application under S. 115, Civil P. C., for setting aside order declaring him ex parte — Jurisdiction of High Court to interfere with order.

In a suit an order declaring a party ex parte was made and a decree was passed. The party did not appeal against the decree within time and hence the decree became final. The party made a petition to the High Court under S. 115 for setting aside the order declaring him ex parte :

Held that even if the lower Court was wrong on merits, the High Court had no jurisdiction under S. 115 to interfere with the lower Court's order. [P 217 C 2 ; P 218 C 1]

Held further that even if the petition was allowed and remanded, the lower Court would not be in a position to deal with the petition and set aside the ex parte decree unless the decree that was already passed had been set aside. The very fact of sending back the petition for consideration by the lower Court would not amount to setting aside the decree : A I R 1915 Mad 197 and A I R 1935 Mad 43, Disting. [P 218 C 1]

Order.—This is a civil revision petition under S. 115, Civil P. C., and I am asked to set aside the order of the learned Subordinate Judge declaring the petitioners ex parte. The learned Judge has given reasons for not acceding to the request of the petitioners to restore the case. On two previous occasions, the suit was adjourned for their convenience and they did not appear. The present is the third occasion. The learned Judge apparently thought that there was no justification for giving them another indulgence. The affidavit filed in support of their application shows that they could have been more diligent in the step they took to be present in Court at the proper time. If they missed the train as they say they did, they could have sent a telegram from the place apprising the Court of their inability to be present and might have followed in a car. They say that they did follow in a car and that they reached the place at a later hour. If they had sent a telegram that would have been better evidence in support of their bona fides. I cannot say that the learned Judge was wrong on the merits in refusing to set aside the order declaring the petitioners ex parte. Even if the learned Judge was wrong on the merits, I am not satisfied that I have jurisdiction under S. 115, Civil P. C., to interfere with the lower Court's order.

Apart from these considerations, there is another factor of importance which has also a bearing on the present question. It appears that a decree has been passed in the suit and as it has not been appealed against within the period allowed by law that decree has now become final. The present position is this: if this petition is allowed, what will be the effect of it on the decree that has been passed already? It appears to me that unless that decree is set aside, the lower Court will not be in a position to deal with this application and set aside the ex parte decree. It is said that the very fact of sending back this application for consideration by the lower Court amounts to setting aside the decree and that decree cannot stand in the way of the disposal of this application. The authorities that have been cited before me do not satisfy that this is the correct legal position. If the decree that has been passed by the Court depended for its validity upon the order which is now challenged before me, then it may be said that the very fact of remanding the application would result in supersession of the decree, but this is not a case of that kind. The decisions brought to my notice, namely 37 Mad 29,[1] and 58 Mad 116,[2] do not therefore help the petitioners. In these circumstances, I cannot see my way to set aside the order of the learned Judge. The proper procedure for the petitioners was to have preferred an appeal against the decree and got their remedy by urging the present grounds. As it is, I do not think I have even jurisdiction to deal with this matter under S. 115, Civil P. C. The civil revision petition is accordingly dismissed with costs.

 Civil P. C. (1908), O. 22, R. 9—Ignorance of death of respondent in absence of negligence is sufficient cause to excuse delay in seeking to set aside abatement.

It is not incumbent upon an appellant to make periodical inquiries as to whether the respondent is alive. Ignorance of the death of the respondent in the absence of any negligence or other act or omission, for which the appellant can be held responsible is sufficient cause within the meaning of S. 5, Lim. Leach C. J.—This is an application for an order excusing delay in seeking to have the abatement of Appeal No. 399 of 1931 set aside and for an order setting aside the abatement. The petitioner is the Secretary of State for India in Council, acting through the Collector of the West Godavari District. It appears that the respondent died on 18th September 1935, but the learned Government Pleader did not become aware of his death until the 4th May of this year, that is two days before the Court closed for the long vacation. The learned Government Pleader promptly communicated with the Collector, who on the re-opening of the Court on the 15th July filed the present application. The learned advocate for the respondent does not contend that there was any delay in filing the application after the news of the death had been received, but he does contend that the Court should not set aside the abatement. His argument is that ignorance of the death of the respondent is not sufficient to support the application.

It has been proved to our satisfaction that neither the Collector nor any Government Official concerned with this appeal was aware of the death of the respondent until May of this year, and that being so, we consider that the petitioner is entitled to have the abatement set aside under the provisions of O 22, R. 9. It is not incumbent upon an appellant to make periodical inquiries as to whether the respondent is alive. We are in entire agreement with the observations in 54 All 280,[1] where it was said that there was no justification for holding that ignorance of the death, in the absence of any negligence or other act or omission, for which the applicant can be held responsible, was not sufficient cause within the meaning of the Limitation Act. A decision to the same effect was given by the Calcutta High Court in 27 C W N 710.[2]

Here it has not been contended that there has been any negligence or any act or omission on the part of the petitioner which would prevent him from having the benefit of S. 5, Lim. Act. For these reasons we excuse the delay and set aside the abatement.

Second Appeal No. 656 of 1933 and Civil Misc. Petn. No. 5047 of 1934, Decided on 25th February 1937, against decrees of Sub-Judge, Vizagapatam, D/- 22nd December 1932.

(a) Madras Local Boards Act (14 of 1920), S. 88—Grant originating in ancient times — Payment to zamindari of kattubadi cess — No inference that grant was by zamindar and not by ruling power.

In the case of ancient grants which originated at a time when the proprietary rights of the ruling power and of the local chieftains were not kept separate and distinct, it should not inevitably be drawn as an inference that, where a certain village is liable to a payment to the zamindari of what is called kattubadi, the grant was made by the zamindar and not by the ruling power : A I R 1923 Mad 454, Rel. on. [P 220 C 1]

(b) Madras Local Boards Act (14 of 1920), S. 88 — Inam lands not included in assets of zamindari — Inamdar is directly connected with Government for payment of cess.

The scheme of the Local Boards Act is that when the inam lands have not been included in the assets of the zamindari, the inamdar is himself a landholder holding directly under the Government. But if the assets include the inam lands as well, he has no direct relation with the Government but the Government collects the cess from the landholder and the landholder reimburses himself from the inamdar treating him as an intermediate landholder : A I R 1937 Mad 917, Rel. on. [P 220 2; P 221 C 1]

Judgment.—The plaintiff is the appellant in this second appeal. He is the Raja of Vizianagaram and the defendants represent the proprietors of the Mokhasa village of Konda Konguva in the Raja's zamindari. The Rajah, during the suit years, included in the sum he paid to the Government as land cess due on his estate under the Madras Local Boards Act 14 of 1920 a certain sum as being the cess due on the rental value of the suit village and he claims that he is entitled under the proviso to S. 88 of the Act to collect from Mokhasadars what he had paid to the Government. There is no question that the payment of land cess under the Act is a proper burden on this village. The defendants however object to pay it through the landholder. They do not deny the liability to pay but claim to pay direct to the Government. Nevertheless the point now in dispute is somewhat important, too important, I think to be raised in a suit like this, which on the surface is concerned only with the machinery provided by law for the collection of a tax. the liability to pay which is not disputed by any of the parties. The point which these parties wish to be decided is whether the Mokhasa village is held by the Mokhasadars on an under tenure created, continued or recognized by the Rajah. If it is so held then under the proviso to S. 88, the Rajah on paying to the Government the land cess due on the Mokhasa village will recover it from the Mokhasadars. The full text of the proviso is :

Provided that in all cases where a person holds lands with or without a right of occupancy as an intermediate landholder on an under tenure created, continued or recognized by a landholder, it shall be lawful for the landholder to recover from the intermediate landholder the whole of the cess paid by the landholder in respect of lands held by the intermediate landholder less one half the cess assessable on the amount of any kattubadi etc., payable by the intermediate landholder to the landholder.

The trial Court decided in plaintiff's favour but the learned Subordinate Judge reversed that decision on an appeal by some of the proprietors holding that the Mokhasa village was not held on an under tenure as described in S. 88 of the Madras Act 14 of 1920. The learned Subordinate Judge considered that the deciding factor in the case was whether the Mokahasa village had, at the time of the permanent settlement in 1803, been included or excluded from the assets of the estate in calculating the total income of the estate on the basis of which the permanent peshkush was fixed. There was evidence in the case which was sufficient to enable a decision to be reached on that point and the learned Subordinate Judge has given his reasons for construing that evidence against the landholder, the present appellant. He found as a fact that the Mokhasa village in suit was excluded at the time of the permanent settlement in making the calculations described above. That was a finding of fact, and since there was evidence to support it, it does not seem to me that it can be made the subject of objection on second appeal. It is argued however that the learned Subordinate Judge wrongly relied on two documents Exs. I and P. There are recitals in those documents which are relevant to the point in dispute but the argument now is that the documents are of no value and that the learned Subordinate Judge should not have relied on them. About Ex. P the argument comes strangely from the mouth of the appellant, because that was a document which was filed by the appellant himself at the trial. However that may be, I am not convinced that the evidence afforded by these two papers was the only evidence on which the Court based its finding. Another argument is that the finding of the Court is wrong because it failed to draw the proper inference from certain undisputed facts. One of these facts is that the village is liable to a payment to the zamindar of what is called Kattubadi. Kattubadi is defined in Wilson's Glossary as a favourable rent assessed on lands granted for public service. The argument is that where you find lands subject to such payment, the proper inference is that the grant was made by the zamindar and not by the ruling power. But though that might appear eminently reasonable at first sight, it is not an inference which can inevitably be drawn in the case of these ancient grants which originated at a time when the proprietary rights of the ruling power and of the local chieftains were not kept so separate and distinct as the rights of the Government and the rights of the landholder are kept at the present day.

Fortunately, this is not a matter into which I am compelled to enter at any great length, because it is the subject of a decision of this Court in 45 M L J 91;[1] it became necessary to decide the nature of an inam whether it was granted by the Rajah of Pittapur or by the Government before the permanent settlement of 1802. At the time of the suit it was found that the land was subject to a small Kattubadi, and the learned Judges (Oldfield and Ramesam JJ.) who decided that case held that the "alienated lands" which were excluded from the accounts at the time of the permanent settlement comprised an inam grant subject to a favourable quit rent. In the present case also, in the sanad by which the peshkush of this particular estate, namely Vijianagaram, was settled, the class of lands to which the Mokhasa village now in suit belongs was expressly excluded. Reliance was placed by the defendants on this sanad Ex. A and the relevant words are :

> This permanent assessment of the land tax on your zamindari is exclusive of the lakhiraj lands and of all other alienated lands paying a small quit rent (which quit rent unchangeable by you, is included in the assets of your zamindari.)

The appellant admitted at the trial that this Mokhasa village was a pre-settlement grant, that is to say prior to 1803, but his case was that it was a grant made by the zamindar of that day. The decision of the lower Appellate Court was that it was not included in the assets of the zamindari in taking the account on the basis of which the peshkush was determined. It was regarded that is to say as a grant made by the Government.

I do not think there is any proper ground for my interfering with the lower Appellate Court's finding of fact that this Mokhasa village was excluded from the assets of the estate at the time of the permanent settlement. This being the state of the facts, it is no longer possible to hold that the village can be regarded as an under tenure village within the meaning of S. 88, Local Boards Act. This very point came for decision very recently before a Full Bench of this Court in (1937) 1 M L J 91.[2] In delivering the judgment of the Court, Varadachariar J. says :

> The scheme of the Local Boards Act is that when the inam lands have not been included in the assets of the zamindari, the inamdar is himself a landholder holding directly under the Government. But if the assets include the inam lands as well, he has no direct relation with the Government but the Government collects the cess from the landholder and the landholder reimburses himself from the inamdar treating him as an intermediate landholder.

I am greatly indebted to the learned counsel on both sides for the most interesting and instructive arguments on the point in issue, but I do not think it is necessary to say anything further on this appeal. This second appeal is dismissed with costs. Leave to appeal is refused.

City Civil Court Appeal No. 40 of 1935, Decided on 3rd August 1937, against decree of City Civil Judge, Madras, in O. S. No. 428 of 1934.

Civil P. C. (1908), Ss. 11 and 80 — Insolvency of J — Official Assignee executing deed of release in V's favour in respect of J's half-share in property in consideration of Rs. 738 — Prior to deed of release, J's half-share sold in execution of D's mortgage decree — Suit by V against Official Assignee for recovery of Rs. 738 on ground that release deed was void—Suit dismissed — Subsequent suit by V against Official Assignee for recovery of Rs. 738 on ground of damages — Suit held not barred by res judicata—Notice under S. 80 held not necessary.

V and J had equal shares in some property. Under a compromise decree V took J's half share in consideration of Rs. 700 which he paid into the Court. Subsequently V discovered that J's half-share was subject to the mortgage of D and he therefore withdrew the amount he had paid into the Court. Later on J was adjudicated insolvent. The Official Assignee executed a deed of release in favour of V in respect of J's half-share and V paid to the Official Assignee the sum of Rs. 738. The release gave V the right to enjoy the share without any claim on J's part or any one claiming under J. Prior to the release deed, the half share of J was sold in execution of D's mortgage decree. Thereupon V filed a suit against the Official Assignee in order to recover Rs. 738 on the basis that the release had no legal effect. This suit was dismissed. V subsequently brought a suit against the Official Assignee representing the estate of J for the recovery of Rs. 738 on the ground that the Official Assignee had granted him a good title in respect of J's half-share, but he had lost that half share and therefore the Official Assignee was liable to him in damages. This suit was instituted without notice under S. 80 :

Held that the suit was not barred by res judicata. The cause of action in the previous suit was different from that in the subsequent suit.

Held further that the Official Assignee in executing the deed of release was not doing an act in his official capacity. The claim against him was not a claim against him personally, but a claim against him as representative of J's estate. Therefore no notice was required to be given under S. 80 to the Official Assignee before the suit was instituted : A I R 1934 P C 96, Rel. on.

K. S. Krishnaswami Iyengar and N. C. Vijayaraghavachariar — for Appellant.

V. Ramaswamy Iyer — for Respondent.

Leach C. J. — The plaintiff sued the Official Assignee as representing the estate of one Janaki Ammal to recover the sum of Rs. 738.8-0 with interest which he had paid to him on 9th September 1931. He averred that circumstances had arisen since the payment was made which entitled him in law to recover this amount. It is necessary in order to understand the position to go into the early history of this matter. In 1900 a piece of immovable property in Madras was purchased in the names of the plaintiff's father (one Duraiswami) and Janaki for a sum of Rs. 200. The plaintiff's father was the brother of Janaki's husband. Duraiswami having died, the plaintiff instituted in the City Civil Court, Suit No. 437 of 1927, for partition of this property and for recovery of the half-share which he said he was entitled to as his father's heir. Janaki defended the suit. She claimed that she was entitled to the whole of the property and alleged that her husband was the purchaser of the property having bought it in her name and in Duraiswami's name benami. This question was not fought out, and on 10th February 1928, the parties came to terms. A compromise decree was then passed in accordance with the arrangement arrived at. Under this decree the plaintiff was to pay Rs. 700 to Janaki for her interest in the property which she was required to quit on 1st March 1928. Janaki had, in fact, mortgaged this property to one Dhanalakshmi in 1926, and had purported to charge the whole of it. She kept this fact from the plaintiff who agreed to the terms above-mentioned in entire ignorance of the fact that there was this mortgage in favour of Dhanalakshmi. Janaki delivered possession of the property to the plaintiff by the due date. On 20th September 1928 the plaintiff paid Rs. 700 into Court. But as he had in the meantime discovered that the property had been mortgaged to Dhanalakshmi, he asked the Court to prohibit Janaki from withdrawing the money from the Court until further orders. The application was granted.

On 19th August 1929, the plaintiff instituted Suit No. 424 of 1929 in the City Civil Court impleading both Janaki and Dhanalakshmi. He asked for a declaration that the mortgage was invalid. Janaki took no part in this suit. The judgment was delivered on 26th August 1930, the Court holding that the mortgage was good to the extent of Janaki's share, and as the plaintiff had no objection to taking that share subject to the mortgage there was a decree on this basis. Dhanalakshmi was also agreeable to her mortgage being limited to Janaki's moiety. In spite of having accepted this position, Dhanalakshmi resiled from it and filed an appeal to this Court. In this appeal she contended that she was entitled to a charge on the whole of the property and refused to recognize the position of the plaintiff. It is not surprising in view of what had happened in the trial Court that this contention did not prevail, the appeal being dismissed on 2nd September 1932. On 10th April 1931, a petition was filed for an order of adjudication in insolvency against Janaki and she was adjudicated on 27th of that month. On 9th April 1931, the plaintiff had withdrawn from the Court the Rs. 700 which he had paid under the consent decree passed in Suit No. 437 of 1927. The next day, the Official Assignee wrote informing him that he proposed to move the Court for an order directing him to bring the money into Court. The reply was that as Dhanalakshmi was entitled to a mortgage decree on a moiety of the property, he was entitled to recover the Rs. 700 plus interest, and he wanted the Official Assignee to give him an indemnity against any claim being made by Dhanalakshmi. The Official Assignee by letter dated 31st August 1931, refused to give the indemnity but by 9th September 1931, the plaintiff and the Official Assignee had come to terms. On that date a deed of release was executed by the Official Assignee in favour of the plaintiff in respect of Janaki's half-share in the property and the plaintiff paid to the Official Assignee the sum of Rs. 738.8.0. It is necessary to refer to a covenant in this document as the plaintiff contends that the Official Assignee did in fact indemnify him in respect of any claim by Dhanalakshmi. This covenant reads as follows :

> The releasee is at perfect liberty to enjoy the property without any let, hindrance or claim on the part of the said Janaki Ammal, the insolvent, or anyone claiming under the said Janaki Ammal.

The plaintiff says that Dhanalakshmi's claim under her mortgage was a claim which in law was made under Janaki. On 11th August 1931, that is a month prior to this release deed, Dhanalakshmi instituted proceedings in execution of her mortgage decree. On that date she applied for leave to bid at the auction. The learned Judge before whom the application came held that there was no need for any sale at all in view of the Official Assignee having executed the release. He forgot, of course, the position of Dhanalakshmi in the matter. He accordingly passed an order dismissing her application for sale. An application by way of revision petition to this Court followed and the order dismissing the application for sale was set aside and the sale application restored to the file. The execution proceedings subsequently took their normal course and the half share was purchased by a third party for over Rs. 1000. That was on 6th March 1933.

The position therefore was this: The plaintiff had paid to the Official Assignee Rs. 738.8.0, in consideration of the Official Assignee releasing to him Janaki's interest in the property and he got nothing for it, because the property had got into the hands of a third party as the result of the execution proceedings. Accordingly on 2nd May 1932, the plaintiff filed Suit No. 406 of 1932 in the City Civil Court against the Official Assignee in order to recover the Rs. 738.8.0. The basis of this suit was that the release had no legal effect, and therefore was null and void. In these circumstances he said that he was entitled to a refund of the money. Judgment was given in this suit on 12th May 1933, the Court holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover because he made the payment with his eyes open. He knew all about Dhanalakshmi's mortgage and he had taken the release for what it was worth at his own risk. It contained no covenant for indemnity and no cause of action was therefore shown in the plaint. This view was upheld by this Court on appeal on 3rd August 1934. The learned Judges were of opinion that the payment made by the plaintiff to the Official Assignee was one of a purely voluntary nature. Then followed the suit out of which the present appeal arises. Here the plaintiff claimed that he was entitled to recover the Rs. 738.8.0 plus interest, on the ground that the Official Assignee had granted to him a good title in respect of Janaki's half share, but he had lost that half share and therefore the Official Assignee was liable to him in damages. The learned trial Judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed on this basis and granted him a decree for the amount claimed.

The Official Assignee challenges the correctness of this decree on three grounds: (i) that the plaintiff was precluded by the doctrine of res judicata from instituting the suit; (ii) that no notice had been given by the plaintiff under S. 80, Civil P. C. and therefore the suit had not been correctly launched; and (iii) that the learned trial Judge had wrongly awarded interest to the plaintiff. There is no substance in the plea that Suit No. 406 of 1932 stands as a bar to the present suit. As I have already indicated that suit was filed on the basis that the deed of release was of no legal effect. The suit out of which this appeal arises is based on the plea that the document is a valid document and that the plaintiff is entitled to damages for the breach of a covenant contained in it. The causes of action in the two suits are entirely different. The doctrine of res judicata can have no application in such circumstances.

Turning now to the second contention of the learned advocate for the appellant, S. 80, Civil P. C., provides that no suit shall be instituted against the Secretary of State for India in Council, or against a public officer in respect of any act purporting to be done by such public officer in his official capacity, until the expiration of two months next after notice in writing has been, in the case of the Secretary of State in Council, delivered to or left at the office of a Secretary to the Local Government or the Collector of the District, and in the case of a public officer, delivered to him or left at his office, stating the cause of action, the name, description and place of residence of the plaintiff and the relief which he claims. The section also states that the plaint shall contain a statement that such notice has been so delivered. For the purpose of dealing with this argument, we will take it that the correspondence which passed prior to suit did not give the notice required by this section, and it is common ground that the Official Assignee is a 'public officer' within the meaning of the section. In the course of the arguments, we were referred to a number of cases decided by the Calcutta High Court and by the Bombay High Court. The Calcutta High Court has for many years taken the view that this section applies to cases founded on contract as well as to cases in tort. The Bombay view has been that the section only applies to action founded on tort But the position has been clarified by a recent decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 61 Cal 470[1] and it is now settled that the section covers cases both in contract and in tort. This decision also shows that in the present case the Official Assignee in executing the deed of release was not doing an act in his official capacity. Further, the suit is not against him in respect of any act done by him in that capacity. In the case mentioned above, a common manager of an estate appointed under the Bengal Tenancy Act, 1885, executed with the sanction of the Court, a mortgage which provided for re-payment of the debt on a specified date. Before that date he died and another manager was appointed. The debt not having been paid, the mortgagee, without giving notice, sued the new manager to enforce the mortgage. Their Lordships held that notice was not necessary under S. 80, because assuming that a common manager is a public officer, the suit was not for an act purporting to be done in his official capacity. Failure to pay the debt when due was not an "illegal omission" so as to be an "act". Sir George Lowndes delivered the judgment and at p. 475 of the report he observes:

> It is also difficult to see how mere omission to pay either interest or principal could be an act purporting to be done by the manager in his official capacity. The mortgage imposed no personal liability upon the manager, but merely provided that, if payment was not made, the mortgagee would be entitled to realize his dues by sale through the Court and this was all that the appellant sought by his suit. The manager for the time being no doubt had an option to pay in order to save the sale, but failure to exercise an option is not in any sense a breach of duty. The appellant made no claim against respondent 1 personally. He was there only as representing the estate of which the sale was sought. In their Lordships' opinion such a suit is not within the ambit of S. 80 and no notice of suit was required.

In the case before us, the claim against the Official Assignee was not a claim against him personally, but a claim against him as representative of the estate of Janaki Ammal, and throughout the case he merely occupied the position as the representative of that estate. Therefore we hold that no notice was required to be given under S. 80 to the Official Assignee before the suit was instituted. Consequently we consider that it was properly launched. The objection with regard to interest also fails. An examination of the judgment shows that the learned Judge did not award to the plaintiff any sum of money as interest. He awarded him the amount claimed on the ground that he had in fact lost property of that value and in doing so we consider he adopted the right attitude. The appeal therefore fails and must be dismissed with costs. No orders in the Letters Patent appeal.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 198 of 1935, D/. 30th September 1937.

Hindu Law—Alienation — Father—Alienation without consent of existing coparceners — Alienation is voidable at their instance — Right to challenge alienation is confined to coparceners alive on date of alienation.

An alienation of joint family property made by a Hindu father without the consent of the coparceners existing at the time is voidable at their instance. Where the only other coparcener in existence besides the father at the time of the alienation is a minor son, the son alone has a right to sue to avoid the alienation of his share of the family property. His right to sue is personal to him, but if his suit is successful, the property is gained back for the family and enures for the benefit of all future members. If he dies without suing, the property is lost to the family for ever. The right to challenge alienations of family property is and must necessarily be confined to the coparceners alive on the date of the alienation. Therefore if he dies without suing, a brother born after alienation but before his own death cannot sue. [P 224 C 2]

The consent, the prolonged carelessness or the death of all other coparceners who were alive when family property is alienated by a Hindu father — these three things finally deprive the family of all right to challenge such an alienation : A I R 1936 Mad 440 and A I R 1925 P C 33, Rel. on. [P 224 C 2]

Order. — The correct position, it seems to me, may be thus stated. An alienation of joint family property made by a Hindu father without the consent of the coparceners existing at the time is voidable at their instance. Where the only other coparcener in existence besides the father at the time of the alienation is a minor son, the son alone has a right to sue to avoid the alienation of his share of the family property. His right to sue is personal to him, but if his suit is successful, the property is gained back for the family and enures for the benefit of all future members. If he dies without suing, the property is lost to the family for ever. The question raised in this case is whether such a son's right to sue on behalf of the family can be exercised by a brother born after the alienation but before his own death. I am of opinion that it cannot, for the reason that the right to challenge alienations of family property is and must necessarily be confined to the coparceners alive on the date of the alienation. They alone are affected. They represented the family on that date. The interests of future members of the family were theirs and must continue to be in their hands only. They have power to ratify and power to challenge and death may rob them of either power and may rob their family of the only representatives competent to protect it in this respect. But it is plain that their power and their responsibility to succour the family fortunes must die with them, and it is just that alienations should be perfected by the death of all the coparceners in whom lay the power to ratify or to challenge or by their prolonged neglect or by their positive assent.

The consent, the prolonged carelessness or the death of all other coparceners who were alive when family property is alienated by a Hindu father—these three things finally deprive the family of all right to challenge such an alienation. This view, it seems to me, receives support from 59 Mad 667[1] at p. 677, 47 All 165[2] and all the other cases quoted to me. I agree with the lower Court that the plaint disclosed no cause of action. I dismiss this petition with costs.

Second Appeal No. 956 of 1933, Decided on 27th September 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, Madura, in A. S. No. 2 of 1933.

 Res judicata — Applicability — Consent decree—When prevents application of doctrine stated — Consent decree deciding disputes finally—It operates as res judicata.

Consent decrees cannot, merely because they are consent decrees, prevent the application of the doctrine of res judicata. In some cases they do prevent the application of the doctrine but that is because there is nothing to show that the parties in consenting to a decree really intended that the decree should be the final decision of their disputes. [P 225 C 2; P 226 C 1]

The plaintiff, a lessor, asserted in his plaint that the defendant, the lessee, had agreed to pay the Municipal taxes and claimed refund on the ground that he, i. e. the plaintiff, was made to pay and the defendant did not deny that fact in his written statement and a consent decree was passed directing payment of the amount due to the plaintiff by instalments. The plaintiff subsequently instituted another suit against the same defendant for refund of taxes paid by him in subsequent years:

Held* that the defendant not having put the matter in issue in the previous suit by raising it in the written statement must under O. 8, R. 5, Civil P. C., be deemed to have admitted it. Having intended the matter to be decided once for all in plaintiff's favour, he was estopped in the subsequent suit from denying his liability to pay the taxes and hence the decree in the previous suit operated as res judicata : *A I R 1934 Mad 454 and (1926) A C 155, Rel. on. Judgment.—This appeal is concerned with the lease of a site in Madura by the plaintiff to a Cinematograph Company and with the liability of the latter to pay certain Municipal taxes. Plaintiff claims refund of certain taxes paid on the ground that the liability to pay them rests upon defendant. The agreement between the parties is contained in a lease deed of 4th November 1927. On an interpretation of the terms of this agreement, the two Courts below have come to different conclusions, the learned District Judge holding against the plaintiff. In view of the discussion which is to follow, it is unnecessary for me to discuss this point in detail or to say more than that I agree with the interpretation given by the learned District Judge. A much more important point however follows and that is a plea of res judicata raised by plaintiff. This plea was accepted by the learned District Munsif but rejected by the learned District Judge. The facts are as follows : A previous suit was filed by plaintiff against defendant in August 1928. In that suit plaintiff claimed arrears of rent with interest and also refund of Municipal taxes paid by him on defendant's account for the years 1925.26, 1926.27, 1927.28 again with interest. In the particulars given regarding the latter claim, it is shown that payment of tax for 1927.28 was made on 28th April 1928, the tax receipt being duly filed with the plaint. In para. 4 of the plaint specific reference is made to the agreement, and to defendant's liability to pay "all the taxes relating to the said plot."

To this plaint, defendant filed a written statement. In that written statement he denied nothing, but complained that plaintiff had rushed prematurely to Court without observing his promise to receive "the arrears" in instalments of Rs. 100 over and above the rent as it fell currently due. No reference at all was made to the Municipal taxes. The only contest raised was regarding the liability to pay interest and the Court was asked to pass a decree directing payment of the principal either in instalments or at a year's interval. On this pleading, the suit did not proceed to trial, but by consent a decree was passed for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, with costs, payment to be made at the rate of Rs. 400 a month. On these facts plaintiff claims that liability to pay the Municipal taxes is res judicata. The learned District Judge dismisses this plea in two short sentences :

I do not think this decision will operate as res judicata, for it was a consent decree and the question of liability for taxes was not put in issue by the defendant. It is possible that the defendant may have agreed to pay these taxes for the sake of peace.

It seems to me that this is to deal with the matter far too summarily. It is well known that consent decrees cannot, merely because they are consent decrees, prevent the application of the doctrine of res judicata. Very often, no doubt, they do prevent it, but that is because there is nothing to show that the parties in consenting to a decree, really intended that the decree should be the final decision of their disputes. See 67 M L J 199,[1] where a ryot consented to a decree in return for the plaintiff's promise to release his crops from attachment. In that case the ryot had filed no written statement and had already succeeded in two Courts on the question at issue—the rate of rent. But what are the facts here? The plaintiff asserts in his plaint that the defendant has agreed to pay the taxes. The defendant does not deny that fact. Under O. 8, R. 5 therefore, defendant must be deemed to have admitted it. He does not put the matter in issue because he has no contention to raise. When he consents to a decree, he is thinking no doubt only of the relief of instalments, but he has already decided at the stage of presenting his written statement that the dispute so far as it regards liability to pay the principal amount of the taxes is to be settled in plaintiff's favour without any contest. It is impossible, I think, in these circumstances to hold that defendant did not intend the decree to decide that dispute once for all in plaintiff's favour. It was argued by Mr. Rajah Iyer that defendant ought not to be allowed to take advantage of the fact that the Court did not itself adjudicate this question of liability to raise it in the second suit though he did not raise it in the first. The best answer to this argument is given in the words of the Privy Council in (1926) A C 155[2] at page 165:

> It is settled, first that the admission of a fact fundamental to the decision arrived at cannot be withdrawn and a fresh litigation started, with a view of obtaining another judgment upon a different assumption of fact; secondly, the same principle applies not only to an erroneous admission of a fundamental fact, but to an erroneous assumption as to the legal quality of that fact. Parties are not permitted to begin fresh litigations because of new views they may entertain of the law of the case, or new versions which they present as to what should be a proper apprehension by the Court of the legal result, either of the construction of the documents or the weight of certain circumstances. If this were permitted, litigation would have no end, except when legal ingenuity is exhausted. It is a principle of law that this cannot be permitted, and there is abundant authority reiterating that principle. Thirdly, the same principle, namely that of setting to rest rights of litigants, applies to the case where a point, fundamental to the decision, taken or assumed by the plaintiff, and traversable by the defendant has not been traversed. In that case also, a defendant is bound by the judgment, although it may be true enough that subsequent light or ingenuity might suggest some traverse which had not been taken. The same principle of setting parties' rights to rest applies, and estoppel occurs.

I am of opinion therefore that in the present case, defendant, by virtue of his pleading in the previous case, was estopped from pleading that he was not liable to pay the taxes in question. In the result the decree of the learned District Judge must be set aside, and the decree of the learned District Munsif restored with costs both here and in the lower appellate Court. Leave refused.

Keneru Lakshmayya — Respondent.

Second Appeals Nos. 708 and 709 of 1933, Decided on 13th September 1937, against decrees of Dist. Court, Kistna at Masulipatam, in A. S. Nos. 170 and 162 of 1932.

(a) Estoppel—District Board issuing licenses to motor bus proprietors for period of two months only—Motor bus proprietors accepting licenses with knowledge that they were for two months—They are estopped from denying that District Board could issue licenses for two months—Ultra vires nature of order of issuing license does not affect question of estoppel.

A District Board through its officer issued licenses to the motor bus proprietors for a period of two months only. The motor bus proprietors accepted the licenses with knowledge that they were issued for a period of two months. They subsequently contended that the District Board had authority to issue licenses for a period of one year and could not issue licenses for a temporary period of two months :

Held that the act of the officer was the act of the District Board and hence the ordinary laws of estoppel that arise out of the conduct of principals applied equally well to the contract of this nature entered into by the District Board with the motor bus proprietors who were estopped from denying that the District Board had authority to issue licenses for a period of two months. The ultra vires nature of the order issuing the license did not affect the question of estoppel: A I R 1925 Cal 1107 and A I R 1928 Mad 164, Disting.

(b) Company—Person entering into contract with company — Contract beyond powers of director — Company ratifying it without knowing it to be ultra vires—Company is not bound by contract (Obiter).

Any person dealing with a company is supposed to be acquainted with its articles and memorandum and therefore to be aware of the powers that the directors have. If therefore one enters into a contract with a company and such a contract is beyond the powers of the director, the company cannot be bound by it ; and even if the company subsequently ratifies the contract without knowledge of the fact that it was a contract entered into ultra vires, the company cannot be bound by the contract. [P 229 C 2]

(c) Highway—Owner of motor bus has no common law right to use highway subject to compliance with some formalities—Such right if at all existed, is taken away by Local Boards Act—Owner of motor bus not having authority to use road causing damage to road — Suit by District Board for damages is maintainable.

The owner of motor vehicle has not an unrestricted common law right to use the highway. However assuming that such a right did at one time exist or must be presumed to have existed from the mere fact that a motor bus is a vehicle that runs along roads it is clear that that right was taken away by the Local Boards Act, unless the person who wished to use the highway got permission to do so from the local body having jurisdiction. He did not ever have a right subject only to his complying with some formality. He has no right at all to use the road unless he got permission from the local body to do so. No doubt the District Board has no complete right of property over the roads. The property vested is such property and such property only as is necessary for the control, protection and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use. The District Board has to spend considerable sums of money in maintaining the road ; and if any person who has no authority to use the road causes damage to that road then the District Board can bring a suit for damage caused to its road by the unauthorised use. Y. Govindarajulu — for Appellant.

P. Satyanarayana Rao—for Respondent.

Judgment. — The District Board of Kistna has brought these suits against the defendants who are motor bus proprietors for a permanent injunction restraining them from plying their motor cars on the roads of the District Board of Kistna without a license, and for recovery of license fees or damages from the defendants for running their respective motor vehicles without licenses. The District Munsif of Masulipatam discussed the various points of law that arose in a very elaborate judgment and came to the conclusion that the District Board was not entitled to an injunction, that they were not entitled to the recovery of license fees as such ; but that there was nothing in law to prevent the District Board from recovering damages for damage to their roads ; and he has assessed the damages on the basis of the license fees which the defendants did not pay. The District Judge, while agreeing with the trial Judge that the suit was maintainable, held that the action of the District Board in granting temporary licenses was ultra vires and that the defendants, although in fact they only received licenses for two months, must be deemed to have obtained licenses for a full year, as the District Board was not entitled to refuse them licenses for that period. He therefore allowed the appeals and dismissed the suits.

The facts that gave rise to the trouble between the Kistna District Board and the various bus proprietors in the District were that certain proposals had been sent to Government for a modification of the bye-laws, so that a higher rate for license fees might be charged. There was also some question as to the legal position that would arise from a bifurcation of the District Board. While these proposals were pending with the Government, the District Board were unwilling to grant licenses for the full period of a year and granted licenses for two months only, debiting the bus proprietors with one-sixth of the annual rate. Upon the expiry of that two months, the applicants made no application for further licenses, but continued to ply their buses without license until the end of the year. It appears from the correspondence that has been filed that other bus proprietors did apply for renewals of their licenses and were told that license would be granted for the remaining period of the year upon their paying the proportionate share for the remaining months in the year of the new rate of license sanctioned by the Government.

A point was raised in the Courts below whether the District Board, in view of the provisions of bye-law 4, sub-s. 1, could issue licenses for a period less than one year. The District Munsif seemed to think that they could and held that in any event the defendants were estopped from denying the right of the Board, in that they had accepted the licenses. The District Judge thought that there could be no question of estoppel, because the actions of the proprietors in applying for licenses for a year and in running their buses for a year showed that they did not accept the terms of the license, while the evidence let in on behalf of the plaintiff did not show that there was an acceptance of the license for two months. I have been taken through some of the more important evidence on this point and there can be no doubt that the motor bus proprietors in the Kistna District were well aware of the discussions that were taking place in the Council and the proposals to enhance the rates for the granting of licenses. They were also aware, of course, of the proposal to bifurcate the District Board. It is also equally clear from the evidence that the District Board intended to extend the licenses without question subject to the payment of such enhanced license fees as might be sanctioned by the Government. It has been contended that there is nothing to show that the bus owners were able to read the stipulation in the licenses granted that they were good only for two months. In view of the fact that the bus owners had been protesting to the District Board against any enhancement of license fees, the defendants cannot be heard to say that they were not aware of the stipulation of the license. Even if they did not know English, it would be their business to find out what was written in their licenses. After setting out the particulars regarding the description of the vehicle, fees paid etc., there was a note in the license to this effect :

> In view of the fact that revised bye-laws which are sent up for the formal approval of Government will come into operation shortly, and in view of the fact that an elected Board will come into office ere long, this license is granted only from 1st April 1929 to 31st May 1929.

The defendants were therefore well aware of the fact that the District Board purported to issue this license for a period of two months only. Had the defendants refused to accept the license for such a short period, then the District Board would have had the option of either issuing a license for a year or refusing it altogether; and it would appear from the conduct of the officers of the Board and the correspondence that took place that it is probable that the Board would have refused to issue licenses for a whole year in view of the fact that the license fees which were expected to come into force shortly were very much higher than the license fees then current. At any rate, by accepting these licenses, the defendants made it impossible for the District Board to exercise any discretion in this matter, and prima facie they would be estopped from denying that the District Board had authority to issue licenses for a period of two months only. The argument of the learned counsel for the defendants is that even if it is true that the action of the defendants showed that they accepted the two months' license, there cannot be any question of estoppel if the contract was itself ultra vires of the Board. Considerable reliance is placed on a case, 52 Cal 748[1] at p. 762, where a portion of the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in (1846) 2 Ph 117[2] at p. 123 is referred to :

> If a party having a right stands by and sees another dealing with the property in a manner inconsistent with that right, and makes no objection while the act is in progress, he cannot afterwards complain. That is the proper sense of the word acquiescence.

But Page J. in the Calcutta case[1] adds "but acquiescence cannot rehabilitate or render valid a transaction which is ultra vires and illegal". It is not contended here that a contract which is illegal can be made legal by acquiescence; and the doctrine of estoppel does not depend altogether upon the legality of a contract. Moreover Page J. in considering the facts of that case, came to the conclusion that there was no acquiescence by the parties and that neither of them was aware of the circumstances that would amount to a representation which led one party to do a certain act to his own prejudice. Other cases have also been referred to, of which a typical one is (1899) A C 114[3] at p. 124:

> It is quite clear that a company cannot do what is beyond its legal powers by simply going into the Court and consenting to a decree which orders that the thing shall be done. If the legality of the act is one of the points substantially in dispute, that may be a fair subject of compromise in Court like any other disputed matter. But in this case both the parties, plaintiff or defendant in the original action and in the cross-action, were equally insisting on the contract. The President, who appears to have been exercising the powers of the company, had an interest to maintain it, and took a large benefit under the judgment. And as the contract on the face of it is quite regular, and its infirmity depends on extraneous facts which nobody disclosed, there was no reason whatever why the Court should not decree that which the parties asked it to decree. Such a judgment cannot be of more validity than the invalid contract on which it was founded.

An extract from Halsbury has also been read somewhat to the same effect. It is clear that what has been considered in Halsbury in the passage referred to and in all the cases above quoted is the liability of a company for an act of its agent or director. Any person dealing with a company is supposed to be acquainted with its articles and memorandum and therefore to be aware of the powers that the directors have. If therefore one enters into a contract with a company and such a contract is beyond the powers of the director, the company cannot be bound by it; and even if the company subsequently ratifies the contract without knowledge of the fact that it was a contract entered into ultra vires, the company cannot be bound by the contract. The present case does not depend upon this principle at all. The District Board entered into the contract by its agents and the District Board did not dispute the liability arising out of the contract. The act of the special officer was the act of the District Board, and therefore the ordinary laws of estoppel that arise out of the conduct of principals apply equally well to a contract of this nature entered into by the District Board through its executive officers with the defendants.

I may refer before leaving this point to a case which I do not think has much importance but deserves mention as the learned counsel for the defendants has stressed it, viz. 53 M L J 810.[4] As this was a criminal case, the learned Judges who decided it were considering primarily what the intention of the accused person was; had the accused person who had applied for the license the right to use a private market? and the decision turned upon the facts that it was a private market and that there was no reason at all why permission to use the market should be withheld, provided that the requirements as to sanitation and so on were complied with. The important section relied on by the accused in that case was one to the effect that if orders on an application for a license are not communicated within 30 days after receipt of the application by the President, the application should be deemed to have been allowed for the year. It was held that the order of the Board was ultra vires and therefore no order at all and that it had therefore to be considered that the license had not been refused. Entirely different considerations arise in the granting of motor bus licenses; and the ultra vires nature of an order does not affect the question of estoppel.

The learned counsel for the defendants has sought to uphold the decree of the lower Appellate Court by contending that the suit was not maintainable, a point on which both the lower Courts were in agreement. It is unnecessary for me to discuss in detail the considerable amount of case law that has been referred to in this case, as the learned District Munsif has discussed most of the cases very carefully and has, I think, correctly interpreted them. The line of argument of the learned counsel for the defendants is that the owner of the bus had the Common law right to take his bus over any road he pleased and that the Legislature, by the Local Boards Act, has not taken away that right but has only compelled bus owners to comply with certain formalities —one of them being the taking out of a license. If the license is not taken out, the only remedy of the Board is to take action against the bus owners for failing to comply with the terms of the Act and to ask the Court to invoke the powers given to it under the Act; for the Board has no cause of action outside the Local Boards Act. I cannot accept the correctness of the contention that the owner of a motor bus has a common law right to take his bus over any road subject to compliance with a formality. When the common law right to use of the roads was being built up, there were of course no motor cars in existence; and it was always understood that the right to the road was one to use it in some recognized and usual manner. If in those pre-motor car days, some vehicle had been driven at a high speed along the roads and caused as much damage as a motor car would do to any ill-constructed road, I doubt very much whether it would have been held that the owner of such a vehicle had the common law right to do what he did and to cause unusual destruction to the road. When motor cars first came into existence, it was incumbent upon an owner to arrange that a man should walk in front of the car as a warning that a dangerous vehicle was coming. Obviously that prevented any excessive speed on the part of the motor car and the motor car could not have done any more damage than any other carriage or cart. As the speed of motor cars increased, the control of the use of these cars increased with it; and I doubt whether at any time the motor vehicle has had an unrestricted common law right to use the highway. However assuming that such a right did at one time exist or must be presumed to have existed from the mere fact that a motor bus is a vehicle that runs along roads, it seems clear to me that that right was taken away by the Local Boards Act, unless the person who wished to use the highway got permission to do so from the local body having jurisdiction. He did not in my opinion ever have a right subject only to his complying with some formality. He had no right at all to use the road unless he got permission from the local body to do so, although Courts have held that permission should not be withheld except for good reason.

In the present case there was no question of withholding permission, for no permission was sought for. Most of the cases referred to in connexion with the remedy of the Board against a person who fails to take out a license are cases in which the local bodies have been given some power to regulate certain acts within their jurisdiction; and it has been held that where a body has been given certain powers under a statute its remedy for disobedience of the orders of the body with regard to those acts must be sought within the Act itself. (1902) 2 Ch 182[5] is a fair example of the type of cases on which the defendants rely. There, the owners of a certain piece of land erected houses; but did not make allowance for roads through the estate of the nature required by the bye-laws of the borough. The borough thereupon brought a suit for an injunction restraining the defendants from proceeding any further with their work and for a declaration that the borough was entitled to pull down any work begun or done by the defendants in contravention of the bye-laws. It was held on the facts of the case (1) that the defendants were not laying out or intending to lay out the highways as new streets within the meaning of the bye-laws; (2) that the bye-laws could not be enforced by action for an injunction, but only by the special remedies thereby provided, or by way of information by the Attorney-General; and (3) that no such declaration as asked for ought to be made. It is partly on account of these cases that the learned District

5. Devonport Corporation v. Tozer, (1902) 2 Ch 182=71 L J Ch 754=86 L T 612.

Munsif refused to grant the declaration and injunction prayed for by the District Board. But it was not considered either in that case or in any of the cases referred to what rights the body would have had if its private property were damaged. If the running of the defendants' bus was a nuisance to the public, and the rights of the public were in some way infringed by the continual running of these buses without license, then, as was actually the case in (1931) 1 Ch 121,[6] the Advocate-General could bring an action on behalf of the public. The question whether the civil rights of a local body had been infringed did not there come up for discussion. The principle that the learned counsel for the appellants seeks to apply has been very well set out in the extract from 31 Bom 604[7] and 50 Mad 91.[8]

> Where a special tribunal, out of the ordinary course, is appointed by an Act to determine questions as to rights which are the creation of the Act, then, except so far as is otherwise expressly provided or necessarily implied, that tribunal's jurisdiction to determine those questions is exclusive. It is an essential condition of those rights that they should be determined in the manner prescribed by the Act, to which they owe their existence. In such a case, there is no ouster of the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts; for they never had any.

The Local Board however do not contend that there is anything in the Act which empowers them in a case like the present to oust the jurisdiction of the Civil Court. They merely rely on the fact that they, like any private person, have a right to bring a suit against any person who does damage to their property, and the damage alleged in the present case is that of the wearing out of the roads which are the property of the District Board. No doubt the District Board has no complete right of property over the roads. As was said by King J. in 69 M L J 269[9] at page 273,

> The property vested is such property and such property only as is necessary for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use.

The District Board has to spend considerable sums of money in maintaining the road; and if any person who has no authority to use the road causes damage to that road, then I can see no reason why the District Board should not bring a suit for damage caused to its road by the unauthorized use. I therefore agree with both the lower Courts that the suit as framed for damages was maintainable. The last question that arises for consideration is the quantum of damages to which the plaintiffs are entitled. The learned Munsif thought that the amount of the license fee was a very good guide to the Court in arriving at a reasonable estimate of the damages. Unfortunately, no satisfactory evidence has been let in on this head. The report by the District Board Engineer to the Municipality recommending certain rates to be adopted in licensing buses has been referred to; but the District Board Engineer himself has not been examined. The document, even if admissible, can have little value. One naturally presumes that in the granting of a license the local body not only allows for any injury that may result to its road by the use of the bus, but also for the pay of the staff whose time is taken up in dealing with licenses, for office expenses and so on, and for some reasonable profit to assist the general revenues of the local body. According to the report of the District Board Engineer, the license fee collected from buses and cars is insufficient for the maintenance of roads, but there is no evidence in support of this. I see therefore no ground for thinking that the actual damage caused to the road by the running of the defendants' buses for ten months was greater than the amount of license fee that they had already paid, which was that for a full year at the old rates.

I therefore find on this point that the plaintiffs have not proved that they are entitled by way of damages to any larger sum than what they have already been paid by way of license fees. On that ground the suit has to be dismissed; but as most of the discussion in three Courts has been taken up by a consideration of technical pleas relating to the maintainability of the suit and other issues arising out of the written statement, with regard to which the defendants have been unsuccessful, the parties will be ordered to pay each his own costs in all the Courts.

Second Appeals Nos. 1353 to 1367 of 1932, Decided on 11th February 1937, against decrees of Dist. Court, East Tanjore at Negapatam, in A. S. Nos. 203, etc., of 1931.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, Rr. 66, 94—Mortgaged property put to sale in execution of mortgage decree—House plots in mortgaged property known as jari manais not mentioned in sale proclamation either by description or by specific survey numbers but included in sale certificate—Plots held not put to sale and suit for eviction of persons in possession of plots did not lie.

Where in execution of a mortgage decree certain house plots known as jari manais, included in the mortgaged property and mentioned in the petition for sale were not mentioned in the sale proclamation either by the description as jari manais or by specific reference to their survey numbers but were included in the Court sale certificate issued to the auction purchaser :

Held that a suit by the auction purchaser for ejectment of persons in possession of the house plots did not lie as those plots had never been put to sale. The Court sale certificate could not confer any title on the purchaser inasmuch as it was only a formal document confirming what was purchased in the Court auction and the purchaser could only base his title to those plots only by virtue of his purchase at the Court auction. Judgment. — This batch of second appeals arises out of several suits in ejectment filed by the plaintiff as mirasidar and landholder of the village of Melamarudur against the several defendants who are in occupation of the sites described in the plaints in the several suits filed against them. The case for the plaintiff is that he became the owner of the said village by virtue of a Court auction purchase and that the title to the suit property vested in him thereunder, that the defendants are in occupation of the sites on condition of rendering certain services to the landlord, that they have failed to render such services and therefore they have forfeited the right to remain on the several sites. He therefore claimed to recover possession of the sites after the removal of the superstructures erected on the suit sites. The Court sale was in execution of a mortgage decree obtained by one Somasundaram Chettiar of Devakottah and which was later on assigned to the plaintiff's father.

The main defence is that the defendants have been in possession of the land for generations, that they have got permanent occupancy right therein, that the suit sites were not comprised in the mortgage, that no title passed to the plaintiff under the Court sale and therefore they are not liable to be evicted. One main point in controversy between the parties in both the Courts was whether the sites were actually included in the mortgage. The suit sites comprised distinct survey numbers, but the mortgage did not specifically mention the survey numbers and the description of the sites was as jari manais. Both the Courts concurrently found that they were included in the mortgage and that finding has not been challenged in second appeal. The District Munsif negatived all the contentions raised by the defendants and held that they had no right to remain in the land and gave a decree in favour of the plaintiff. But the learned District Judge dismissed the plaintiff's suit on the ground that no title passed to the plaintiff in the Court sale. It is against this decision that these second appeals have been filed. It seems to me that the view taken by the learned Judge is correct and that his judgment will have to prevail. There is no doubt that the mortgagee obtained a decree for sale of the entire mortgaged property including the suit sites. It is also clear that in the execution petition filed after the final decree for sale of the properties, the plaintiff had asked for the sale of the suit sites, but unfortunately, in the sale proclamation, these sites were not mentioned. The property was divided into 18 lots and each lot was described by specific survey numbers and in none of the descriptions of the several lots were these jari manais included either by their description as such or by specific reference to their survey numbers. The result is that these jari manais were never put up for sale. No doubt the plaintiff purchased all the 18 plots but it does not affect the question whether the said plots were really sold and the plaintiff obtained title thereto by virtue of the auction purchase. The Court sale certificate did really include the plots, but that cannot confer title. The Court sale certificate is only a formal document confirming what was purchased in the Court auction. The plaintiff can only base his title to the suit property by virtue of his purchase at the Court auction. The defendants who were not parties to execution proceedings are entitled to raise the defence that the plaintiff is not entitled to sue them in ejectment. It may be very unfortunate for the landholder, but he has himself to blame. He should have seen that these plots had been specifically described in the sale proclamation, and if he has failed to do so, he must suffer.

I therefore confirm the decision of the learned District Judge and dismiss these second appeals. It must be stated that this point was neither raised in the written statement nor urged before the trial Court, and it was only allowed in the appellate Court. I had some difficulty in coming to the conclusion whether the view of the learned District Judge was correct without the necessary documents on which the said conclusion should be based. I therefore called for the necessary documents, namely the execution application, the sale proclamation, and the bidding list. I have now satisfied myself after looking into those documents that the conclusion of the learned District Judge was correct. Therefore in the circumstances, I direct each party to bear his own costs throughout. Leave refused.

Captain R. Rajagopalan — Accused — Respondent.

Criminal Appeal No. 316 of 1937, Decided on 11th November 1937, from order of Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Coimbatore, in Criminal Appeal No. 28 of 1937.

 Motor Vehicles Act (1914), S. 16—Madras Motor Vehicles Rules, R. 30 (a) — Owner of private motor lorry carrying goods for reward on one occasion without license — Offence under R. 30 (1) is committed.

It may be true that R. 30 (a) was primarily intended to apply to motor vehicles which are used for the express purpose of letting for hire; but even if a motor vehicle is used only once for such a purpose, then on that one occasion it is nonetheless let for hire because the owner does not ordinarily use his lorry for purposes of reward. Hence if a person undertakes to convey goods for reward in his private lorry, on one occasion without license he has let that vehicle for hire and so commits an offence under R. 30 (1). [P 233 C 2; P 234 C 1]

Appellant in person.

N. R. Govindachari and S. Rangachari — for Respondent.

Judgment.—The accused entered into a contract with the District Forest Officer of the Nilgiris to convey quantities of sandalwood from the Seigur Range in the Nilgiris District to Satyamangalam in the Coimbatore District. For the purpose of fulfilling his contract, he used his registered private lorry and on one of his trips to Coimbatore, the lorry was stopped within that district by the Sub-Inspector of Police, Annur, and when the driver was asked for the "G" permit, it was found that he had none; and he and the owner were therefore charged by the Coimbatore Police under S. 16, Motor Vehicles Act. The owner was convicted by the Sub-Magistrate of Mettupalayam. In appeal the Subdivisional Magistrate of Coimbatore held that the car was actually let for hire within the Nilgiris District and that therefore the Courts of Coimbatore District had no jurisdiction to try the offence, the Subdivisional Magistrate holding that under R. 30 (a), the motor vehicle is prohibited from being let for hire without a "G" permit and as the accused's lorry was let for hire in the Nilgiris he could not be tried at Coimbatore. He therefore allowed the appeal and acquitted the accused.

The Crown have appealed against this acquittal. The order of acquittal is sought to be sustained in this Court not on the ground of jurisdiction, but on the ground that the Legislature did not intend to compel the owner of a private vehicle, who ordinarily uses his vehicle for his own purposes, to take out a license merely because on one occasion he conveyed goods for hire in his private lorry. It may be true that R. 30 (a) was primarily intended to apply to motor vehicles which are used for the express purpose of letting for hire; but even if a motor vehicle is used only once for such a purpose, then on that one occasion it is nonetheless let for hire because the owner does not ordinarily use his lorry for purposes of reward. A number of cases have come before this Court in which the owners of private cars who acquired their cars for their own professional purposes have been convicted because they have received a reward from persons carried in their cars. It has been held that by so doing the owner was guilty of letting the car for hire. Similarly, if a person undertakes to convey goods for reward in his private vehicle, he has let that vehicle for hire and so commits an offence under R. 30 (1), Motor Vehicles Rules. The conviction of the Sub-Magistrate of Mettupalayam was therefore right and the order of the Subdivisional Magistrate, Coimbatore, allowing the appeal and acquitting the accused was wrong. The Government appeal will therefore be allowed.

It is urged that this is a technical offence, in that the accused did not wilfully infringe any rule and probably honestly believed that he was under no obligation to take out a "G" permit; and that he should therefore be fined only some nominal sum. It seems probable however that the amount of fine that has been levied from him is appreciably less than the amount he would have been compelled to pay for taking out a "G" permit for the period for which he was conveying sandalwood from the Seigur Range to Satyamangalam. In restoring the order of the Sub-Magistrate, the fine inflicted by the Sub-Magistrate, will be re-imposed, not so much as a punishment for innocently infringing a technical rule, but as a sum to be paid to Government towards the loss of license fees.

D. Ramaswamy Aiyengar and T. P. Kannabiran — for Appellant.

Burn J.—These two appeals are preferred against the order of the learned Subordinate Judge of Coimbatore passed on E. P. R. No. 349 of 1935 in O. S. No. 261 of 1934. O. S. No. 261 was a suit filed by the United Planters' Association of South India against a minor, S. Venkatasubramania Sarma, by his guardian. The suit was based upon the allegation that the father of the minor, Sundareswara Sarma, who had been employed as an accountant by the Association had misappropriated Rs. 7500 of the Association's money. A decree was passed in favour of the Association against the separate assets of the deceased Sundareswara Sarma if any in the hands of the minor defendant. The Association got an attachment before judgment of three sums : viz. (1) a sum of about Rs. 5000 representing the contributions of Sundareswara Sarma to the Association's Provident Fund ; (2) an insurance policy of Rs. 1000 and (3) an insurance policy of Rs. 4000. Both the policies are issued by the Oriental Government Security Life Assurance Company Ltd. and copies of the policies were filed as Exs. 1 and 2. The learned Subordinate Judge held that the amount of Rs. 5000 representing Sundareswara Sarma's contributions to the Provident Fund could not be proceeded against and he came to the same decision with regard to the amount of Rs. 4000 due under Policy No. 353009, but he held that the amount of Rs. 1000 covered by Policy No. 123164 could be proceeded against. The learned Subordinate Judge said in his judgment that it had been fairly conceded on behalf of the defendant that the sum of Rs. 1000 could be proceeded against. Mr. Ramaswami Aiyengar who appears for the appellant in A. A. O. No. 16, says that the guardian of the minor defendant did not give the vakil in the lower Court any authority to make any such concession. We must take the learned Judge's observation as representing the fact that the vakil whether with or without authority did make that concession, but it is not necessary to embark upon a discussion of whether the vakil had authority to make such a concession since we propose to consider that appeal also on its merits. Appeal No. 56 is filed by the Association from the decision of the learned Judge holding that the decree-holder was not entitled to proceed against the amount of the policy for Rs. 4000 and the amount in the Provident Fund.

With regard to the amount in the Provident Fund, we agree with the learned Subordinate Judge. An attempt was made to argue that the deceased Sundareswara Sarma has been dismissed from the Association's service before he died. The learned Subordinate Judge refused to allow that point to be raised before him. He said that if this were the fact, it ought to have been stated when the decree-holder first sought to attach the property. He says in para. 7 that it transpired at the trial that the deceased died while he was still in the service of the Association. This we are told is incorrect, but we note that the judgment in the suit itself begins with a recital that the Association sued to recover a certain sum of money from the son of Sundareswara Sarma, "who was employed under the Association as an accountant from 1927-28 till his death in 1934." We therefore follow the learned Subordinate Judge in declining to allow it to be argued on behalf of the Association that Sundareswara Sarma was dismissed before he died. This being so, we are of opinion that the rules of the Provident Fund are such that Sundareswara Sarma's contributions to the Provident Fund are not liable to attachment to defray his debts any more than the contributions of the Association itself. In fact if it be taken that Sundareswara Sarma died in service, it is not really possible to maintain that his contributions were liable to attachment.

The real contest is with regard to the two policies of insurance. We are of opinion that there is no difference between the two. Both of them are liable for the debts of Sundareswara Sarma, or neither. The learned Subordinate Judge seems to have been influenced by the concession already referred to when he held that the policy for Rs. 1000 could be proceeded against. With regard to the policy for Rs. 4000, he has referred to a pamphlet, Ex. 3, issued by the Oriental Government Security Life Assurance Co. Ltd. In that pamphlet, the policy in the form Ex. 2 is advertised as providing the most practical form of protection obtainable for the wife and family of the assured. The policy is called a perfect protection policy. The learned Subordinate Judge after reading the provisions comes to the conclusion that the policy "is more or less on a line with life assurance policies covered by the Married Women's Property Act and that the policy is covered by the ruling in 55 Mad 171.[1]" S. 6, Married Women's Property Act, is quite definite. It runs as follows :

> A policy of insurance effected by any married man on his own life and expressed on the face of it to be for the benefit of his wife or of his wife and his children, or any of them, shall enure and be deemed to be a trust for the benefit of his wife or of his wife and children or any of them according to the interest so expressed and shall not so long as any object of the trust remains be subject to the control of the husband or to his creditors or form part of his estate.

If the amounts of these policies are to be saved for the minor defendant in this case, it must be because they come strictly within the terms of S. 6, Married Women's Property Act. It will not do to say, as the learned Subordinate Judge says, that these policies are "more or less on a line with Life Assurance Policies covered by the Married Women's Property Act." Now it cannot be disputed that on the face of these policies themselves there is no expression that they are for the benefit of the wife or of the wife and children of the insurer. Mr. Ramaswamy Aiyengar for the appellant in A. A. O. No. 16, realizing this wishes to contend that the policy does not mean merely the policy as issued by the Company but must be taken as including the proposal filled in by the insurer and also if necessary any prospectus issued by the Company. He relies upon the decision in 25 Mad 183.[2] We are of opinion that this case has no bearing upon S. 6, Married Women's Property Act. Although for certain purposes in cases of dispute between the insurer and the insured it may be necessary to look into the proposal or the prospectus or even, as stated in 25 Mad 183[2], to construe the prospectus as though it were part of the policy, we think the terms of S. 6, Married Women's Property Act, are clear and unambiguous and that the expression "policy of insurance" in that section is to be taken in the ordinary meaning of those words. The provision was passed in order to create a trust in favour of wife or wife and children. For this purpose it is enacted that the policy which is to create such a trust must be "expressed on the face of it" to be for the benefit of the insurer's wife or wife and children. This, we think, is clearly intended as inter alia a measure of protection for persons who might be induced to take an assignment of the policy. If there is an expression on the face of the policy that the policy is for the benefit of the insurer's wife or wife and children, the prospective assignee will be put on his guard. This would certainly not be the case if the term "policy of insurance" were interpreted to mean the proposal as well as the Company's prospectus. This view is supported by the decision of Venkatasubba Rao J. in 71 M L J 39.[3] In that case the amount of the policy was expressed to be payable "to the person or persons legally entitled thereto." In the present case in the column, "to whom payable" in Ex. 2, we find the words :

> The proposer's assigns or his proving executors or administrators or other legal representatives who shall take out representation from any British Court to his estate or limited to the moneys payable under this policy.

There is nothing on the face of either of these policies to indicate that the policies were effected for the benefit of the insurer's wife or wife and children or any of them. Mr. Ramaswamy Aiyengar wishes us to admit in evidence copies of the proposals made by the insurer in pursuance of which these policies were issued. We are refusing to admit those copies since we find that the requirements of O. 41, R. 27, Civil P. C., are not fulfilled. There is no allegation that they were shut out by the lower Court and we do not find them necessary in order to enable us to pronounce judgment. We think it is right to say as Venkatasubba Rao J. said in the case already referred to, that under S. 6, Married Women's Property Act "for a trust to arise it must appear on the face of the document that the policy was effected for the benefit of the wife or the wife and children or any of them." We have been referred to the case decided in 55 Mad 171[1] in which Madhavan Nair J. construed in favour of the wife a life-insurance policy in which it appeared that the amount was payable "to the assured or his wife if he predeceases her." Since those words did appear on the face of the policy in that case we do not think that it is necessary to discuss the judgment of Madhavan Nair J. but we are quite clear that we are not prepared to go even further than he went. It would be necessary to go a great deal further in this case in order to accept the contentions of Mr. Ramaswamy Aiyengar, because neither of the policies in this case mentions the wife or the children of the insurer. It follows that A. A. O. No. 16 of 1936 is dismissed with costs and A. A. O. No. 56 of 1936 is allowed with regard to the amount of the Policy No. 353009 and dismissed with regard to the amount of the Provident Fund. The appellant and the respondent in A. A. O. No. 56 of 1936 will pay and receive costs proportionate to their success.

Pandrang Row J.—This is an appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Devakottah dated 22nd February 1932 in O. S. No. 198 of 1930 on his file. The suit was one instituted by the two plaintiffs to recover nearly Rs. 13,000 from defendants 1 to 4. The suit claim was based on a document dated 2nd February 1926, Ex. A. That document was brought about as the result of an arrangement arrived at between the plaintiffs on the one hand and defendant 5 on the other immediately after the death of the sister of defendant 5 who had been married to plaintiff 1 who was then a minor. In fact the case of the plaintiffs was that disputes arose about the properties that had been given to this lady Valliammai Achi at the time of her marriage between plaintiff 1 and defendant 5, each claiming the money as his. This dispute arose before the corpse was removed from the house of plaintiff 1 and a number of caste men and relations acted as panchayatadars and pronounced their opinion in accordance with which the document Ex. A was executed by defendant 5 and plaintiff 2 on behalf of the then minor plaintiff 1 and attested by the panchayatadars, one of whom was defendant 1 with whose firm the moneys had been deposited. Defendant 1 did not contest the suit. Defendant 2 pleaded that he was not a necessary party to the suit. Defendants 3 and 4 put forward the claim of defendant 5 to the moneys in question and defendant 5 was the principal contesting defendant. His case was that, excepting a small portion, the moneys had been given by his family at the time of the marriage and that on the death of the girl without leaving any issue the same should revert to his family according to the custom among the Nattukottai Chetties. As regards Ex. A, defendant 5 completely denied that there was any arrangement as alleged or that he had signed Ex. A. The most important of the issues framed by the Court below were issues 1 to 3 and 7. The first three issues raised the question whether the arrangement relied upon in the plaint and Ex. A were true and whether defendant 5 had consented to it and acquiesced in it. Issue 7 related to the question of limitation. All the important issues were decided in favour of the plaintiffs and the learned Subordinate Judge made a decree accordingly in favour of the plaintiffs and against defendants 1 to 4.

In the present appeal by defendants 1, 3 and 5, the following points have been argued by their learned advocate : (1) that Ex. A is not a binding contract or agreement as it is not supported by consideration and (2) that the suit is barred by limitation. It is hardly possible to question the correctness of the finding of the Court below that Ex. A was actually executed by defendant 5 after the panchayatadars had settled the terms thereof on the date which Ex. A. bears. Defendant 5 who is the only witness examined on his side no doubt denied that he had agreed to any such arrangement or that he signed in Ex. A., but there can be no doubt that his evidence on these points is completely false and so far as this part of his case is concerned, there cannot be the least doubt that it is devoid of truth. The execution of Ex. A by defendant 5 as well as by plaintiff 2 is proved by three panchayatadars, P. Ws. 1, 2 and 4, one of whom, namely P. W. 1 is a man of substance occupying a high rank in society being a Rao Bahadur, M. B. E. and an ex-member of the Legislative Council. Their evidence has been accepted by the Court below and there can be no doubt that their evidence as regards the execution of Ex. A. by defendant 5 is true. In a subsequent document (the execution of which is admitted by defendant 5, Ex. C) executed a few months afterwards, there is a reference to an amount of Rs. 1100 credited in the name of defendant 5's son in defendant 1's firm which cannot be anything other than a similar amount agreed to be credited to the same person in the same firm according to Ex. A. Defendant 5 is unable to give any account as to where this amount of Rs. 1100 came from or how it came to be credited in the name of his son. Ex. C. therefore furnishes independent evidence in support of the plaintiff's case that defendant 5 executed Ex. A.

On this part of the case, we have not the slightest hesitation in agreeing with the finding of the Court below, viz. that there was a dispute, that there was an opinion expressed by the panchayatadars and that a family arrangement was come to which is embodied in Ex. A, which was signed by defendant 5 and by plaintiff 2 and attested by the panchayatadars. The evidence in the case permits of no other conclusion, viz. that there was a dispute about the money that had been deposited with defendant 1's firm at the time of the marriage in the name of the then minor plaintiff 1 and that this dispute was settled in the manner indicated in Ex. A. As regards the contention that Ex. A is not enforceable against defendant 5 by reason of the absence of consideration therefor, it is sufficient to say that according to Ex. A itself the consideration was the settlement of the dispute that had arisen and the restoration of peace and harmony in the family. In this connexion it must be mentioned that defendant 5 himself is married to the sister of plaintiff 1 and that lady was alive at the time. It was therefore necessary in the interests of family harmony that the dispute should be amicably settled. The mere fact that the claim of one of the parties to the dispute might have had more legal foundation than that of the other does not necessarily show that the dispute was not bona fide or that the arrangement was not a proper family arrangement. There is nothing in the evidence which throws doubt on the bona fide character of the dispute or the propriety of the arrangement. As mentioned already the contest in the Court below was about the truth of the arrangement and the genuineness of Ex. A. Under Ex. A defendant 5 himself got some benefit in the sense that a portion of the money, viz. Rs. 1100 was agreed to be set apart or credited in favour of his son and it was only the balance that was to be drawn by plaintiff 2 for the benefit of plaintiff 1 from the firm with which the money was lying. We are therefore of opinion that Ex. A cannot be considered to be invalid or unenforceable for any alleged want of consideration. The bona fide settlement of a family dispute does not require any specific consideration to support it.

Exhibit A indeed can be viewed in another light viz. in the light of an assignment of an actionable claim within the meaning of S. 130, T. P. Act. The writing that is contained in Ex. A is sufficient to show that the intention of the parties was that one portion of the money lying with defendant 1's firm should belong thenceforward to defendant 5's son and the other portion should belong to plaintiff 1. It must also be remembered that defendant 1 himself was a party to the arrangement in the sense that he acquiesced in it and attested Ex. A. S. 130, T. P. Act, does not require that the assignment of an actionable claim should be in any particular form or that there should be consideration for it. As was observed in 30 Mad 75[1] at p. 77, no particular words are necessary to effect the transfer of a debt or any beneficial interest in moveable property and no particular words are necessary to effect such a transfer if the intention to transfer is clear from the language used.

It is in the light of these general principles that the documents that were the subject matter of discussion in 27 Bom 150[2] and 16 I C 708[3] were considered to amount to assignments. We might refer also to (1886) 17 Q B D 442.[4] The intention that can be gathered from Ex. A is in our opinion fairly clear and that intention was that the money that was lying in defendant 1's firm should be split up into two parts, one of which was to belong to defendant 5's son and the other to the then minor plaintiff 1 for whose benefit it became payable to the order of plaintiff 2. This operates as an assignment of the entire debt in two separate portions to two separate individuals. It is unnecessary to dilate on this aspect of the question because it does not appear to have been considered in the Court below and it will therefore be enough to rest our decision on the basis that Ex. A is something other than an assignment, viz. a family arrangement in settlement of a bona fide dispute.

1. Rama Iyer v. Venkatachalam Pattar, (1907) 30 Mad 75=16 M L J 554.
2. Nandu Bai v. Gau, (1903) 27 Bom 150=4 Bom L R 951.

4. Harding v. Harding, (1886) 17 Q B D 442=55 L J Q B 462=34 W R 775.

The other point which raises the question of limitation can be more briefly dealt with. The date of Ex. A is no doubt 2nd February 1926 whereas the plaint was filed on 11th April 1929, i. e. a little more than three years after the date of Ex. A. The question is which is the Article which applies to a claim of the present nature. If it is Art. 60, as found by the Court below, there is no doubt that there is no bar of limitation because no demand was made till 1928. It is however contended that this is not a claim to which Art. 60 can apply but that Art. 115 applies. This Article relates only to claims for compensation for breach of a contract. The present claim is not for compensation but merely to obtain money which is lying with a banker's firm to the credit of plaintiff 1. The original deposit of the money at the time of Valliammal Achi's marriage was undoubtedly a deposit with a banker and this position has not been disputed before us. It is however contended that after the execution of Ex. A the position was radically changed and the money was no longer a deposit with a banker. We fail to see how this transformation can be said to have been effected by Ex. A. On the other hand Ex. A clearly says that the portion of the money that was to go to plaintiff 1 was payable to the order of plaintiff 2 by the firm with whom the money was lying. The original deposit itself was in the name of plaintiff 1 and the arrangement came to nothing more than that a portion of what was deposited should be paid for the benefit of plaintiff 1 and to the order of plaintiff 2. In other words that money still remained as a deposit payable on demand to the order of plaintiff 2. These last words were inserted because plaintiff 1 was a minor and could not draw the money himself. We are of opinion that the lower Court was right in its view that Art. 60 applied to the present suit and that the right to sue did not accrue till there was a demand and a refusal; and if this is the correct view, it is clear that the suit is not barred by limitation. We therefore concur in the finding of the Court below on this point also. The result is the appeal fails and it is dismissed with the costs of the plaintiff-respondents.

BEASLEY C. J.

Padmanabhuni Narasimhadas — Petitioner.

v.

Dist. Board of Kistna, Masulipatam — Respondent.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 784 of 1935, Decided on 10th December 1936, from decree of Sub-Judge, Bezwada, in Small Cause Suit No. 286 of 1934.

Madras Local Boards Act (14 of 1920), S. 225—Test for applicability of S. 225—Suit for balance of amount due under contract made with District Board to construct culvert on road within its area is not governed by S. 225.

Though a case under S. 225 does not stand to be determined in the light of a somewhat similar provision in the Public Authorities Protection Act in England which no doubt was the parent of the provision not only in the Madras Local Boards Act but also in the Madras District Municipalities Act but is somewhat differently worded being rather more general in its provisions, yet the same principles applicable to English law apply to a case under S. 225. [P 240 C 1]

The real test to be applied for the applicability of S. 225 is whether what was complained of was some act done in pursuance of the statute. To a suit to recover the balance of amount due under a contract made with a District Board to construct a culvert on one of the roads within its area, S. 225 does not apply and hence to such a suit the bar of limitation mentioned in that section does not apply : C. R. P. No. 1913 of 1934, Rel. on; A I R 1935 Mad 213, Disting. [P 241 C 1]

Order.—The suit, the subject of this civil revision petition, was instituted by the petitioner against the District Board of Kistna to recover the balance of an amount due to him under a contract made with that District Board. The contract was to construct a culvert on one of the roads within the area of the District Board. Amongst the defences raised in the suit was one of limitation, it being pleaded that, as the suit had not been filed within six months of the accrual of the cause of action, it was barred by reason of S. 225, Madras Local Boards Act. The lower Court, after a careful and elaborate examination of the authorities touching this question, held that the case came within the provisions of that section and the suit not having been filed within six months from the date of the cause of action dismissed it as being barred by limitation. In my view that decision was clearly wrong. Whilst this case does not stand to be determined in the light of a somewhat similar provision in the Public Authorities Protection Act in England which no doubt was the parent of the provision not only in the Local Boards Act but also in the District Municipalities Act but is somewhat differently worded being rather more general in its provisions, nevertheless I am of the view that the same principles apply here, although I am not basing my decision upon them. It is conceded here by the learned counsel for the respondent Board who has argued the case with the greatest ability that although under S. 1, Public Authorities Protection Act in England suits arising out of contracts claiming the balance of money due for work done or goods supplied are not protected, he contends that, by reason of the different wording of the Local Boards Act here, a suit as this does come within the provisions of S. 225. Contrasting that section with the somewhat similar provision in the District Municipalities Act, it will be seen that in the latter, suits for damages and compensations are referred to while in the former there is no such limitation and instead the words "no suit or legal proceeding" are used. Contrasting that section with S. 1, Public Authorities Protection Act, I am bound to say that it is certainly more similar to the latter than S. 350, District Municipalities Act.

I am satisfied that such a suit as this does not come within the provisions of S. 225, Local Boards Act. I was referred to a very early decision of this High Court, viz. 2 Mad 124.[1] There the suit was brought to recover from the Municipal Commissioners of Madura the balance of a sum of money due for timber supplied under a contract duly made with them; and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to sue on the breach of contract without giving notice, such a suit not falling under the provisions of S. 168, Towns Improvement Act (3 of 1871, Madras). The words of that section as they are set out in the judgment are that such notice must be given when a suit "is brought against the Commissioners or any of their officers or any person acting under their direction for anything done under the Act". It is difficult to imagine any more general words than those. Yet, dealing with that section with those very general words, it was held that such a suit as that was not protected by that section. The words there are even more general than those in S. 225 and I find it very difficult to distinguish between a suit claiming the balance of a sum of money due for goods supplied under a contract made with a local Board and a suit claiming the balance of an amount due for work done under a contract made with a Local Board.

In my view, both these suits are indistinguishable in their nature. The learned Subordinate Judge has relied upon amongst other cases 58 Mad 746,[2] a Bench decision of this Court. That was a decision of Varadachariar and Burn JJ. There the claim was a different one to that here. There the suit was filed against the District Board more than six months after the accrual of the cause of action claiming damages on the ground that its President improperly cancelled a contract of lease for one year of the tolls in certain places. It was stated to have been entered into by him with the Board through its Vice-President. The President in performance of what he (the President) thought was his duty under the Madras Local Boards Act, as he interpreted the same, accepted a higher offer by another person and the cancellation of the acceptance of the original offer was the necessary result. It was held that S. 225, sub-ss. (1) and (3), Madras Local Boards Act, applied and the suit was out of time and that, though the distinction between actions on contract and actions independent of contract may be convenient enough as a working rule in such cases, the real test to be applied was whether what was complained of was some act done in pursuance of a statute. It was held in that case that the act done was in pursuance of a statute the right to collect tolls being a special privilege conferred by statute upon local bodies under the terms of S. 106 (1), Madras Local Boards Act, being authorized either to manage the collection of the tolls themselves or through their own agency or to lease them out. The facts in that case, in my view, are entirely distinguishable from those here, and in this view I am supported by the recent unreported decision of Venkataramana Rao J. in C. R. P. No. 1913 of 1934. There the plaintiff instituted a suit of an exactly similar nature to this to recover money due to him for work done under a contract with the District Board. The learned Judge says :

1. Mayandi v. McQuhae, (1879) 2 Mad 124.

2. Athimannil Muhammad v. Malabar District Board, (1935) 22 A I R Mad 213=155 I C 291=58 Mad 746=68 M L J 125.

The action is thus based upon moneys due and recoverable under a contract. The learned Subordinate Judge non-suited the plaintiff on the ground that the requisite notice under S. 225, Madras Local Boards Act had not been given. In my view, this opinion is unsound. This section was recently interpreted by a Bench of this Court wherein the correct principle of interpretation was laid down thus :

The real test is whether what is complained of is some act done in pursuance of the statute. In cases where there is no dispute as to the existence of a contract, all further rights and liabilities between the parties are governed by the ordinary law relating to contracts, and it is true enough in such case to say that the rights and liabilities of the parties in respect of the contract are matters of ordinary law and not matters governed by the statute.

The learned Judge was there referring to the decision reported in 58 Mad 746.[2] He further on states : "We must take the plaint as it stands and the action was perfectly competent." Taking the plaint as it stands, it is a claim for the balance of an amount due under a contract and all defences which are open to a defendant in such a suit are open to the defendants here. But it is quite obvious that S. 225 does not apply to the case and that there is therefore no different period of limitation than there is to ordinary suits under contracts. For these reasons, I am satisfied that the lower Court's judgment was wrong and must be set aside and the suit remanded to the lower Court for disposal according to law. The petitioner will have his costs here ; and costs in the lower Court will abide the result of the trial.

Judgment.—The main point in this appeal is what is the court-fee payable on the plaint. As a result of two decrees obtained in two suits, O. S. No. 15 of 1912 on the file of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Chingleput, and O. S. No. 47 of 1910, on the file of the District Court of Chingleput, one Krishna Reddy was entitled to recover possession of certain immovable properties from defendants 1 and 2 on payment of a certain sum of money to them. Some time after these rights were finally ascertained by the said decrees, he surrendered the rights so obtained by those decrees in favour of defendants 1 and 2 for a sum of Rs. 22,000 by a deed of settlement dated 27th June 1927. It is this deed of settlement that the plaintiff as the reversioner of the said Krishna Reddy after his death, seeks to set aside. The plaintiff's case is that the said deed of settlement was brought about by fraud, coercion and undue influence practised upon Krishna Reddy and therefore it should be declared not binding on the plaintiff. He also claims an alternative relief that, if the deed is found to be valid, the plaintiff should be given a decree for Rs. 22,000 being the consideration for the deed as the said amount was not paid to the said Krishna Reddy. There is also a further relief claimed by the plaintiff, viz. a claim for specific performance based upon an agreement alleged to have been executed by Krishna Reddy in favour of the plaintiff. The plaintiff valued the claim at the sum of Rs. 22,000 and paid court-fee thereon, viz. Rs. 1222-7-0. Dispute as to the question of the proper court-fee having been raised, the learned Subordinate Judge went into the matter and came to the conclusion that all the three reliefs claimed in the plaint must be valued separately. He therefore directed the plaintiff to pay additional court-fees on the alternative relief for Rs. 22,000 and also on the claim for specific performance. The result of this decision was that the plaintiff had to pay an additional court-fee of Rs. 3104-14-9. The plaintiff was given a fortnight for the payment of the said court-fee. He was unable to pay that sum within the time allowed and the learned Subordinate Judge by his order dated 29th March 1932, rejected the plaint. And this appeal is filed against that order.

So far as the learned Judge's direction directing the plaintiff to pay court-fee on the claim for specific performance is concerned, it is absolutely correct and its correctness has not been challenged before us. But the main point argued by Mr. Champakesa Aiyangar is in regard to the direction to pay additional court-fee on the sum of Rs. 22,000, the alternative relief claimed in the plaint. The view taken by the learned Subordinate Judge is that it must be considered to be a distinct subject within the meaning of S. 17, Court-fees Act. We are not inclined to accept this view as correct. The cause of action is the execution of the deed of settlement and two reliefs have been claimed in respect thereof, one on the footing of the validity of the deed and the other on the footing of its invalidity. The test which is sometimes laid down in order to ascertain whether two or more claims constitute different subjects within the meaning of the S. 17, Court-fees Act, viz. whether different suits might have been instituted in respect thereof, has not been held to be a decisive one by the Full Bench of this Court, see 54 Mad 1[1] by which we are bound. In view of this decision, as the cause of action is based on the settlement deed, we are not inclined to consider that the reliefs claimed are distinct subjects within the meaning of the said section. We therefore think that the court-fee paid for the claim under Cl. 22-A of the plaint is quite sufficient and the plaintiff need not pay additional court-fee for the alternative relief.

Then the question is, what is the relief which the plaintiff is entitled to in this appeal, he having failed to pay the additional court-fee in time? The amount that was directed to be paid by the order of the lower Court is Rs. 3104-14-9. If the plaintiff had not been directed to pay additional court-fee on the alternative relief, the plaintiff perhaps might have been able to comply with the order in so far as it directed additional court-fee on the claim for specific performance. In the view we have taken in regard to the court-fee on the alternative prayer, we feel that we ought to allow the plaintiff some time for the payment of the additional court-fee on the claim for specific performance as directed by the lower Court and that it is not proper to reject the plaint on the ground of non-compliance with the order. We therefore set aside the order of the lower Court and direct it to receive the plaint on the plaintiff paying the additional court-fee on the claim for specific performance within one month from the date of the receipt of this order in the lower Court. In default of this payment, this appeal will stand dismissed. We also direct that the appellant should pay the costs of this appeal to the respondents. The appellant will be entitled to a refund of the court-fee paid in this appeal but only on his complying with the order of this Court by paying the additional court-fee in the lower Court within the time allowed.

Second Appeal No. 258 of 1933, Decided on 20th August 1937, against decree of District Court, North Malabar, in A. S. No. 194 of 1932.

(a) Malabar Law—Tarwad — Incidents of, explained—Comparison with Mitakshara law.

A Malabar tarwad or tavazhi is a corporate unit just like the Mitakshara joint Hindu family. The members are joint in food, worship and estate but the property held by them is impartible except with the consent of all the members. No individual member has any definite share therein nor can he enforce a right to a share by partition. The mode in which the proprietary right is enjoyed is by participating in the enjoyment of the family property, and provision is made sometimes for maintenance and other expenses which in law are strictly in exercise of a proprietary right. The right of management is vested in the senior male member called karnawan who has got certain rights of alienation analogous to the powers possessed by a manager of a joint Hindu family. His right to management is unrestricted except in cases where he is guilty of waste or makes some alienations not for the benefit of the family when the junior members of the family have got a right to interdict by taking appropriate proceedings in a Court of law. The right possessed by an individual member enures only for his life. Neither the principle of the right of representation nor the principle of survivorship as known to Mitakshara law exists but the birth or the death of a member may affect the other members in the extent of beneficial enjoyment of the tarwad property or the death of a member leaving property which lapses to the tarwad may enable the other members to share the enjoyment thereof also with the rest of the tarwad property. The rights and obligations flow out of the status of being a member of a tarwad. Once it comes to an end by any means known to the law, they can neither be enjoyed nor enforced. [P 244 C 2]

(b) Malabar Law—Tarwad — Conversion — Effect of—Status as member and incidents of Tarwad are severed — Words "tenancy-in-common" are hence not properly applicable.

Under the strict Hindu law, converts not only become divided in status but forfeit all rights to their tarwad property; but Act 21 of 1850 preserved their right to the property in that they could still continue to possess the rights incidental to their ownership, that is the right to have provision made for their residence and maintenance from and out of the property possessed by the tarwad at the date of the conversion and any additions made thereto with the income thereon. But the Act does not preserve their status as a member of the tarwad or the incidents appropriate to and dependent thereon. The use of the terms, 'tenancy-in-common' and 'survivorship' with reference to the members of a Malabar tarwad is not strictly accurate. What does really happen on conversion is that the joint status is severed and the property possessed by the tarwad cannot thereafter be held by the remaining members of the tarwad along with the convert as members of a tarwad: A I R 1921 Mad 224 (F B), Expl.; 9 M I A 539 (P C) and 1913 M W N 886, Ref. [P 245 C 1, 2]

(c) Malabar Law—Tarwad—Gift—Presumption that donees take property with incidents of tarwad — Gift to members some of whom are converts — Property taken as tenants in common and each donee can claim separate share.

Where there is a gift to persons who are members of a Malabar tarwad, a presumption is raised that the donees are intended to take the property with the incidents of tarwad property. But where the gift is to members some of whom have been converted and as such cannot be members of a tarwad they take the gift as tenants-in-common and each one can claim his separate share: A I R 1916 Mad 391 (F B), Ref. [P 245 C 2; P 246 C 1, 2]

Judgment.—The question in this second appeal is what is the nature and extent of interest possessed by defendant 2 in certain properties, one of which is a boat, the subject matter of this appeal, left by one Kunhikutti. The plaintiff, defendant 2, and the deceased Kunhikutti formed members of a tavazhi following the Marumakkathayam law. Before his death, the said Kunhikutti disposed of his properties by a registered will dated 27th December 1923. His object was to benefit the members of his tavazhi. This is clear from the following preamble to the will:

> I should make certain settlements regarding the claimants who are to enjoy the ownership right of my self-acquired properties after my death.

After stating that the property possessed by him was his self-acquired property and that it should be enjoyed by him till his death, he specifies the persons to whom it should go after his death thus:

> And after my death, my brother (1) Amabadi, (2) younger brother Chandu, (3) nephew Maniokam's son Raman alias Joseph Sadanandan, (4) younger brother Kunkan, (5) younger brother Ryru, (6) younger brother Sankaran, (7) Achuthan alias Benjamin Sadanandan, (8) nephew Kunhi Pennu's son Andi, (9) Kunhi Pennu, (10) Cheeru, (11) Korumbi, (12) Kunhi Pennu, (13) Kaliyani, (14) Madhavi and the Santhanams of the female members among them who are already born and who are yet to be born, are the claimants of the said properties.

(No. 1 Amabadi is defendant 2 in the suit.) Then he provides for the maintenance and enjoyment of the said property thus:

> My representative No. 1 is to hold the said properties and cause them to be held. He should pay the jenmi purappad, effect renewals of the said properties by entering into agreement with the jenmis, manage the odams (boats) and the nets, hold the mudaruthi pattam, collect the outstandings to be recovered, effect repairs to the nets whenever they get damaged, manage the Sardine Press and take the proceeds and protect the other members according to the income and enjoy the said properties. And after the death of No. 1, the male members out of the members from No. 2 onwards aforesaid and after their death the male issues in the females who are now living and those that are to be born should manage the properties according to their seniority. And in default of male issue, the females, according to their seniority, should hold the properties and cause them to be held according to the Marumak-kathayam law of inheritance and take the income therefrom and enjoy the same. And when it becomes necessary that a loan had to be raised, all the then members, both male and females who have attained their majority, should join together and execute a document under their joint signatures And all the debts and alienations otherwise incurred or effected will not be binding either on the properties or on other members and they will not be liable therefor. As the major income to protect the members aforesaid are to be derived from the boats and nets, the male members and other than Nos. 3, 7 and 8 should exert themselves to the top of their capability in the management and work and protect the members of the family as aforesaid. In case the remaining members are not prepared to do so, such anandiravans should be excluded from the properties by a registered notice executed jointly by all the remaining members. And if they are so excluded, they will be devoid of any right over the said properties and on the annual income therefrom.

Nos. 3 and 7 referred to above are the sons of two of his nephews, namely Joseph Sadanandan and Benjamin Sadanandan who are Christians by religion. On a reading of the will, there can be no doubt that what the testator intended was that the property should be owned and enjoyed by all the members of the tavazhi to which he belonged and that it should be possessed and managed after the manner of tarwad property in accordance with the rules of the Marumakkathayam law by which he was governed, with certain restrictions in regard to the management regarding loans and alienations. It is also evident that the testator regarded the said Joseph and Benjamin as members of his tavazhi and intended to benefit them. The question now is has defendant 2 any individual interest in the properties devised? Can defendant 1 seize and sell the boat in execution of a decree obtained against defendant 2? The contention of the plaintiffs is that the properties are devised to the tavazhi as such, that defendant 2 has no individual interest therein which could become the subject of sale and the attachment of this boat by defendant 1 is invalid and inoperative. The crucial question is, was the property taken by defendant 2 and other legatees as tavazhi property or as tenants-in-common owning a several share therein? This again is dependent on another question whether the legatees were members of a tavazhi. The lower Court answered the question in the affirmative relying on 44 Mad 891.[1] This is canvassed by Mr. Govinda Menon on behalf of defendant 1. His argument is that two of the legatees, who are admittedly Christians on the date of the will cannot be members of the tavazhi along with the other legatees; that they cannot together in law form a tavazhi and that the view of the lower Appellate Court that in spite of the conversion to Christianity a person can continue to be a member of a tavazhi is unsound and the gift therefore is not to the tavazhi as such.

To test the soundness of this contention, it is necessary to examine what the legal effect of the conversion of a member of a tarwad or tavazhi on the holding of the property by such a tavazhi or tarwad is. A Malabar tarwad or tavazhi is a corporate unit just like the Mitakshara joint Hindu family. The members are joint in food, worship and estate but the property held by them is impartible except with the consent of all the members. No individual member has any definite share therein nor can he enforce a right to a share by partition. The mode in which the proprietary right is enjoyed is by participating in the enjoyment of the family property, and provision is made sometimes for maintenance and other expenses which in law are strictly in exercise of a proprietary right. The right of management is vested in the senior male member called karnawan who has got certain rights of alienation analogous to the powers possessed by a manager of a joint Hindu family. His right to management is unrestricted except in cases where he is guilty of waste or makes some alienations not for the benefit of the family when the junior members of the family have got a right to interdict by taking appropriate proceedings in a Court of law. The right possessed by an individual member enures only for his life. Neither the principle of the right of representation nor the principle of survivorship as known to Mitakshara law exists, but the birth or the death of a member may affect the other members in the extent of beneficial enjoyment of the tarwad property or the death of a member leaving property which lapses to the tarwad may enable the other members to share in the enjoyment thereof also with the rest of the tarwad property. The rights and obligations flow out of the status of being a member of a tarwad. Once it comes to an end by any means known to the law, they can neither be enjoyed nor enforced. Conversion to any alien religion is one of the modes which puts an end to the status. The effect of conversion with reference to the position of an undivided family governed by Hindu law is thus stated by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in 9 M I A 195[2] at page 237 thus :

> The tie which bound the family together is, so far as he is concerned, not only loosened, but dissolved. The obligations consequent upon and connected with the tie must .... be dissolved.

They again observe :

> Parcenership, understood in the sense in which their Lordships here use the term, as expressing the rights and obligations growing out of the status of an undivided family, is the creature of, and must be governed by, the Hindu law ..... Parcenership may be put an end to by a severance effected by partition ; it must, as their Lordships think, equally be put an end to by severance which the Hindu law recognizes and creates.

It therefore cannot be disputed that the tie which bound the tavazhi together, on conversion of the said two members, so far as they are concerned, became dissolved and they could no longer be members of the tavazhi. Their rights and obligations incident to their status as members of the tavazhi must therefore cease. If the strict Hindu law be applied, they would not only become divided in status but would forfeit all rights to their tarwad property ; but Act 21 of 1850 preserved their right to the property in that they could still continue to possess the rights incidental to their ownership, that is, the right to have provision made for their residence and maintenance from and out of the property possessed by the tarwad at the date of the conversion and any additions made thereto with the income thereon. But the Act does not preserve their status as a member of the tarwad or the incidents appropriate to and dependent thereon. To illustrate, if a member of a tarwad dies leaving his self-acquired properties undisposed of, they lapse to the tarwad and any member of the tarwad gets the benefit of such acquisition but the convert by ceasing to be a member of the tarwad cannot participate in the enjoyment of the said property by reason of the severance of the status. In 1912 M W N 386,[3] a Division Bench took the view that on conversion the incident of survivorship would no longer subsist, the convert becomes a tenant-in-common and is entitled to claim partition. This view was dissented from in 44 Mad 891[1] where it was pointed out that Act 21 of 1850 does not enlarge the rights which a member had before conversion and what was impartible cannot be rendered partible by reason of the conversion. The use of the terms, "tenancy-in-common" and "survivorship" with reference to the members of a Malabar tarwad, if I may say so with respect, is not strictly accurate. What does really happen on conversion is that the joint status is severed and the property possessed by the tarwad cannot thereafter be held by the remaining members of the tarwad along with the convert as members of a tarwad. The decision in 44 Mad 891[1] does not lay down that in spite of conversion, a member continues to be a member of a tarwad as assumed by the learned District Judge. Again, where there is no right to partition, there is no right of survivorship. In a Mitakshara undivided family, it is the right to partition which determines the right to take by survivorship. The right possessed by an individual member in a Malabar tarwad ceases with his life and there is no devolution of an undivided interest as in a Mitakshara family. Even if the principle of survivorship is held applicable to a Malabar tarwad, it can only subsist so long as the undivided status subsists. As observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 9 M I A 539[4] at p. 611, according to the principles of Hindu law, there is coparcenership between the different members of a united family and survivorship following upon it. (The italics are mine). From this, it follows that if there is no united family, there can be no survivorship. This is also the view of the Division Bench in 1912 M W N 386,[3] where the learned Judges observe at page 390 thus :

> The incident of survivorship was one which attached to the property on account of its being owned by the members of a joint Hindu family. When the Hindu family ceased to exist, the incident of survivorship ceased to exist.

Act 21 of 1850 cannot preserve the right which is contingent and dependent on the continued subsistence of a particular relationship which is not saved by the Act. The observation of Wallis C. J. in 44 Mad 891[1] that survivorship is not lost is obiter and if I may say so with respect, not correct. Thus the correct legal position occupied by the members of the tavazhi to which the testator belonged on the date of the will is that the two members who became converts do not belong to the said tavazhi and the legatees specified in the will together cannot and do not form a tavazhi. Where there is a gift to persons who are members of a Malabar tarwad, a presumption is raised that the donees are intended to take the property with the incidents of tarwad property: 39 Mad 317[5]. As Srinivasa Ayyangar J. points out in that case, which was a case of a gift by a member of a Malabar tarwad to his wife and children :

> It is not the giving of properties by a person to his wife and children that constitutes them a tarwad or tavazhi, but that if properties are given to a wife and children following the Marumakkathayam law, they as a tavazhi hold those properties with the incidents of tarwad property.

The gift under such circumstances is presumed to have been made to an entity which is called a tarwad or tavazhi. In the present will, there are no express words conferring the property on the tavazhi as such. Of course all the legatees mentioned therein, but for the conversion of the two members, will together constitute the tavazhi. But if in law they could not form a tavazhi, the presumption should not be given effect to. The operative portion of the gift must therefore be construed as a gift to certain named or existing legatees and persons to be born. The gift to unborn persons cannot take effect but the gift cannot fail on that account. The named legatees and such of the children of the female members who were alive on the date of the death of the testator will take the properties as tenants.in.common. Though the primary intention may have been to benefit the members of the family as such, there is also a secondary intention to benefit those who can take. The limitations and restrictions in regard to the holding and enjoyment of the property would be invalid as the testator cannot by any act of his constitute certain members into a tavazhi for the law would not permit such a thing and it is not open to him to tie up the property in the manner he has chosen to do. In this view, defendant 2 will be entitled to a several share and whether it is 1/14th or still less will depend upon whether there was any issue born to the female legatees who were alive on the date of the death of the testator.

In this view it is unnecessary for me to consider the argument based on S. 39 of the Marumakkathayam Act which confers a right of partition on individual members of a tarwad in cases where there is any change of religion. Mr. Krishnamurti advanced a contention that even assuming the two convert members could not be members of the tavazhi after their conversion, the rest of the members constitute a tavazhi and must be deemed to have continued as such and the gift therefore must be construed as a gift to the tavazhi and the two converts. I am not inclined to agree with this contention. From the language employed in the will it is clear that no distinction was drawn between the members who were converts and the other members in regard to the nature of the gift and there was no intention to treat the members other than the two convert members as an entity. In the result, I set aside the decree of the learned District Judge and hold that defendant 1 is entitled to attach and sell defendant 2's interest in the suit property in execution of the decree obtained against him. The respondents will pay the costs of the appellant here and in the Court below. (Leave refused.)

A. Rajaratna Mudaliar—Respondent.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 451 of 1936, Decided on 5th October 1937, from decree of Dist. Munsif, Ranipet, in Small Cause Suit No. 294 of 1935.

 (a) Vendor and Purchaser—Agreement to purchase property—Mere fact that deposit is demanded by vendor implies that it should be forfeited if contract is broken.

It is a well known principle of law that if a purchaser, on agreeing to purchase any property agrees also to pay, and does pay a deposit, that deposit is to be regarded as security for the fulfilment of the contract. Though there may be nothing specific about forfeiture, the mere fact that a deposit was demanded carries with it the implication that it should be forfeited if the contract were broken, unless purchaser proves an agreement to the contrary. [P 247 C 1, 2]

(b) Deed—Construction—Sale — Recital in sale deed that price is to be paid before Sub-Registrar—Implication.

Where it is recited in the document of sale itself that the consideration is to be paid before the Sub-Registrar, it implies of course that it is to be paid within four months. [P 247 C 2]

(c) Contract — Construction — Expression "regard the contract as at an end", meaning.

The expression "regard the contract as at an end", means some mutual agreement between parties to the contract that both of them no longer consider it necessary to go through with their transaction. It cannot be applied to the mere mental realization by one party of the fact that other party has broken the contract or to a party's failure to sue for damages or specific performance: A I R 1935 Mad 903, Dissenting. [P 247 C 2]

Order. — This petition is concerned with an agreement between plaintiff and defendant that defendant should sell certain property to plaintiff for Rs. 2500. The undisputed facts of the case are that defendant executed a sale deed on 22nd May 1932, received Rs. 100 as an advance towards the purchase price, and handed over the sale deed to plaintiff. Subsequently the sale deed was returned by plaintiff to defendant and the four months' time for registration passed without any further payment on plaintiff's part. In 1935, plaintiff filed the present suit to recover the Rs. 100 from defendant with interest and also the charges he had incurred in purchasing the stamp. He based his claim upon a repudiation of the contract by defendant, who, he said, asked for the return of the sale deed in order to sell the property to some one else. The learned District Munsif refused to believe this allegation on plaintiff's part, and held that defendant's evidence that plaintiff returned the sale deed because he was unable to find the purchase money was true. He nevertheless gave plaintiff a decree for the refund of Rs. 100 on the grounds : (i) that there was no agreement that it should be forfeited if plaintiff broke the contract ; (ii) that no time was stipulated within which the transaction was to be completed, and (iii) that defendants "treated the contract as at an end".

I am unable to accept any of these reasons as justifying the lower Court's decree. The first appears to be a finding of fact but is not really so. It is a well-known principle of law that if a purchaser on agreeing to purchase any property agrees also to pay, and does pay a deposit, that deposit is to be regarded as security for the fulfilment of the contract. Here there is no doubt that the deposit of Rs. 100 was insisted upon by the defendant as a term of the contract. The lower Court holds the view that because no terms were reduced to writing, defendant should not be believed when he says that the deposit was to be forfeited, but even if defendant has in this instance gone too far, and in fact nothing specific was said about forfeiture, the mere fact that a deposit was demanded carries with it the implication that it should be forfeited if the contract were broken, unless plaintiff proves an agreement to the contrary. This he has made no attempt to do. The second reason I am unable to understand. Plaintiff admits in cross-examination that it was recited in the document itself that the consideration was to be paid before the Sub-Registrar, which implies, of course, that it was to be paid within four months. Plaintiff does not assert that this clause in the sale deed was not meant to be operative.

For its third reason, the lower Court relies upon a ruling reported in A I R 1935 Mad 903.[1] That is a ruling which, with respect, I find it difficult to appreciate. It proceeds upon no basis of facts proved, lays down the law theoretically as to the conditions upon which a purchaser who has broken his contract may recover an advance which he has made, and then gives a decree not for the refund of any such advance, but allowing the purchaser four months' time to complete his payment of the purchase price. I am unable to see how this case can govern the case with which I am now dealing, where plaintiff does not ask to be permitted to make further payment. If it does govern the present case, it still remains to analyze what is meant by the expression, "regard the contract as at an end". To me, it seems to mean some mutual agreement between plaintiff and defendant that both of them no longer consider it necessary to go through with their transaction. It cannot be applied to the mere mental realization by the defendant of the fact that plaintiff has broken the contract or, in my opinion, to defendant's failure, to sue for damages or specific performance. Is defendant who holds in his hands a deposit liable to forfeiture, to be compelled to institute legal proceedings against a purchaser who has no money with which to pay him and as the evidence in this case shows, no property on which to raise any money ? I am accordingly of opinion, and as I said before, that none of the lower Court's reasons can be supported as justifying its decree, and must allow this petition and dismiss plaintiff's suit with costs throughout.

Leach C. J. — This is an application by the Rajah of Venkatagiri for an order against the respondents for contempt of Court. The petitioner is the plaintiff in a suit in the District Munsif's Court, Nellore, for an injunction restraining 40 inhabitants of Venkatagiri from entering the petitioner's forests and cutting firewood therein. The defendants claim that they have the right to cut firewood there and to sell it. They base this right on grant, custom and prescription. The suit was filed in June last and on 27th August the following article appeared in the 'Zamin Ryot' which is published in Nellore :

HELP THE ARAVA-MALAS OF VENKATAGIRI.

Means of livelihood enjoyed for generations deprived by the estate.

Appeal by Kamatam Shunmugam, M. L. A.

There are about 500 families of Harijans in Venkatagiri. During the time of Chevi Reddi, the original ancestor of the Rajahs of Venkatagiri estate, one Yachadu, the original ancestor of Malas, sacrificed his life as offering at the bidding of Bhairavamurthi (deity) in order to provide the estate with money. In pursuance of the (last) favour asked for by Yachadu prior to the sacrifice, whenever marriages take place in the house of the estate (people) even to this day, they first perform the marriage of one among the Malas, take the holy rice showered on the (bridal) couple and thereafter perform their own marriages. Out of such Malas, about 300 families have been serving the estate for the past about 29 generations, as grooms, keepers of the elephants and as servants getting fodder to the said animals. The salaries paid to them are not even enough to satisfy their barest necessities. Consequently, they have been, in addition to their salaries, eking out their livelihood by bringing and selling dry firewood from the forests situate in Venkatagiri. None of the late rulers of the estate ever raised any objection in regard to this. Since about one year, the estate has been selling firewood by opening a firewood depot and has (thereby) not only ruined the occupation of these people, but also caused an injunction order to be issued against them. Now the estate has prepared some (kind of) statements and while forcing them to sign or affix their marks therein, dismissed from service 40 persons who did not do so. When they go to the small villages near by to gather green and dry grass with a view to sell the same and earn a living, they are setting up the raiyats to obstruct these people in the respective villages. Every now and then criminal cases are being concocted and filed and these people are sent to the prisons. The estate, besides not only ruining their occupation in this manner, has also been putting them to considerable trouble and loss by maliciously using their entire influence. Civil cases are going on between the two parties. Certain kind-hearted advocates are conducting the proceedings on behalf of the Malas free (of costs). Until the cases are disposed of, the said 300 families have to suffer for their food and raiment. I therefore pray that countrymen, who have the welfare of the poor at heart, will naturally render assistance to these people, either in cash or paddy or any other article necessary for their life. Kind-hearted donors are requested to send in their contribution to the following persons :

(1). Arava Surayya, Kapidipalem, Nellore.

(2). Arava Padanarasayya, Yeguvapalem Venkatagiri Town.

The author of the article is respondent 2, who is a member of the Madras Legislative Assembly. Respondent 1 is the editor of the paper. The petitioner complains that the article constitutes gross contempt of Court, and we consider this to be the case. The article states the defendants' case and infers that it is true. It then accuses the petitioner of having ruined the defendants and of having concocted false criminal cases against them. It further accuses the petitioner of using his influence maliciously and to the detriment of the defendants. The fact that the article closes with an appeal for assistance for the defendants does not help the respondents. This appeal could have been made without the accusations which preceded it. The law is quite clear and it is stated thus at p. 91, Edn. 3 of Oswald's Contempt of Court :

All publications which offend against the dignity of the Court, or are calculated to prejudice the course of justice, will constitute contempts. Offences of this nature are of three kinds—namely those which (1) scandalize the Court ; or (2) abuse the parties concerned in causes there ; or (3) prejudice mankind against persons before the cause is heard. Under the first head fall, libels on the integrity of the Court, its Judges, Officers, or proceedings ; under the second and third heads anything which tends to excite prejudice against the parties, or their litigation, while it is pending. For example, attacks on or abuse of a party, his witnesses or solicitor, constitute contempts, though a mere libel on a party, not amounting to an interference with the course of justice, does not, the party being left to his remedy by action.

In (1742) 2 Atk 469=26 E R 683,[1] Lord Hardwicke observed :

Nothing is more incumbent upon Courts of justice than to preserve their proceedings from being misrepresented ; nor is there anything of more pernicious consequence than to prejudice the minds of the public against persons concerned as parties in causes, before the cause is finally heard.

And he added :

There cannot be anything of greater consequence than to keep the streams of justice clear and pure, that parties may proceed with safety both to themselves and their characters.

In (1930) 2 Ch 368[2] at page 376 Maugham J. observed :

I think that to publish injurious misrepresentations directed against a party to the action, especially when they are holding up that party to hatred or contempt, is liable to affect the course of justice because it may, in the case of a plaintiff, cause him to discontinue the action from fear of public dislike, or it may cause the defendant to come to a compromise which he otherwise would not come to for a like reason.

The fact that the trial Judge would not be affected by the article has no bearing on the matter, as was pointed out by this Court in the case in 55 Mad 262.[3] The defence set out in the affidavits is that the respondents did not regard the article as being of a nature which would prejudice the fair trial of the suit and they offered to express their regret if the Court were of a contrary opinion. The belief of the respondents does not excuse the offence. Lord Langdale, M. R. in (1839) 2 Beav 129=48 E R 1129,[4] said :

Whatever might have been his belief at the time he published these articles, that belief will not protect him from the consequences, if his publication has been of such a nature as to disturb the free course of justice. The effect of such publications would seem to be not only to deter persons from coming forward to give evidence on one side, but to induce witnesses to give evidence on the other side alone. What I am to consider is, whether these papers are or are not calculated to disturb the free course of justice.

At a later stage in the case, Lord Langdale observed :

I am surprised that a gentleman of education and science should think that it was serving the cause of truth and justice, or likely to benefit the gardeners, whose interest he professes to advocate, to publish articles of this description pending the progress of a cause.

The respondents have appeared before us and the Court having informed them that it considers that the article does constitute grave contempt, they have expressed their regret for their action. In these circumstances we do not consider it necessary to take any action in the matter

Appeal No. 267 of 1931, Decided on 29th September 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, Trichinopoly, in O. S. No. 3 of 1929.

(a) Words and Phrases—'Sukhavasi,' meaning.

The word "Sukhavasi" means "one who lives in comfort without any particular employment." [P 250 C 2]

(b) Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act (2 of 1927), S. 73 (3)—Suit by worshippers of temple against Sukhavasis for declaration that latter are not entitled to receive fixed share in prasadams and for injunction restraining trustees from allowing such claim —Such suit does not come within purview of S. 73 (3).

The words 'further or other relief' in S. 92, Civil P. C. must on general principles of construction be taken to mean relief of the same nature as those described in Cls. (a) to (g). In enacting S. 92, the Legislature could not have intended to include relief against the third parties under the general words "further or other relief." The same reasoning applies to S. 73 (3), Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act : A I R 1928 P C 16, Foll. [P 251 C 2]

There is a marked difference between the wording of the relevant part of S. 73 (3), Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act, and the corresponding portion of S. 92 (2), Civil P. C. Under the latter provision, the suits contemplated are those filed claiming any of the reliefs specified in the section. But the words in S. 73 (3), Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act are much wider and more comprehensive : A I R 1934 Mad 126, Rel. on. [P 251 C 2]

In a suit by worshippers of a temple against Sukhavasis, the right of the trustees or the Committee to make charitable doles, including the giving of doles to the Sukhavasis, was not questioned and it was not sought to fetter their discretion in any way. What the worshippers sought was to have their right declared as against the Sukhavasis (strangers to the trust) and to restrain the trustees from giving and the Sukhavasis from receiving fixed share of prasadam :

Held that the suit did not come within the purview of S. 73. The further relief claimed against the trustees was merely ancillary to and consequential upon the declaration and did not alter the character of the suit. [P 252 C 1]

Venkatasubba Rao J. — The learned District Judge has in respect of almost every question of fact decided in favour of the plaintiffs, but has come to the conclusion that the suit is not maintainable by reason of Cl. 3 of S. 73, Hindu Religious Endowments Act (Madras Act 2 of 1927). The question to be decided in the appeal is, whether the view of the learned Judge that the suit is barred by the provision referred to above can be sustained. The suit has been brought by certain five worshippers in the Sri Ranganathaswami Temple at Srirangam, with the consent obtained of the Board of Commissioners. The object of the suit is to get a declaration in respect of a class of persons known as Sukhavasis. The plaintiffs complain that these Sukhavasis have been asserting a claim to a certain fixed share of the prasadams offered to the deity, and that in assertion of that right, they have gone the length of claiming a cash payment in lieu of their share of the prasadam when that is not available. The questions which the learned Judge had to decide were : (1) whether the Sukhavasis had been in enjoyment of the allowances, as alleged by them, continuously for such a period, as would serve to raise a presumption of a legal origin, and (2) whether the emoluments were attached to the performance of any religious office, service or duty in the temple in question. On both these matters, the learned District Judge in a lucid and closely reasoned judgment, has recorded findings, as already stated, against the defendants. We may incidentally observe here, that the word "Sukhavasi" means "one who lives in comfort without any particular employment." (Tamil Lexicon published by the University of Madras). The respondents' counsel has not challenged these findings of fact, and the question that now has to be decided therefore is one of law, namely whether or not the suit is barred under S. 73 (3) of the Act.

The lower Court has, in our opinion, been misled by the clumsy drafting of some of the paragraphs in the plaint. There were three sets of defendants impleaded; first, the trustees of the temple, secondly, the members of the Trichinopoly Hindu Devasthanam Committee, and thirdly, the Sukhavasis. On a close examination of the plaint, it is perfectly clear that it is not sought to fetter the discretion of the trustees in doling out the offerings to such persons as they think deserving; the Sukhavasis are under no particular disability, and they may, like any other worshippers or pilgrims, receive, and be given, the prasadam. It is the right put forward by the Sukhavasis to a fixed share that has been objected to. To claim a right to charity is a contradiction in terms, and what the Sukhavasis have been getting according to them, are not charitable doles but perquisites, which could be claimed as a matter of right, attached as they are, to the performance of certain services. Unfortunately however, the wording of the plaint seems to suggest that the suit was intended to prevent the Sukhavasis getting any charity whatsoever, as though they were marked out for some special penalty.

A brief reference to the facts that immediately preceded the institution of the suit, will serve to make the prayers in the plaint clear. The Sukhavasis are of the Vadagalai persuasion and their claim to a fixed share was generally looked on with disfavour by the Tengalais. The plaintiffs suggest that in dealing with the claim put forward by the Sukhavasis, the trustees or the members of the Committee are generally swayed by sectarian motives. It seems unnecessary to go into this question, nor would it be right on the material before us to say that the plaintiffs' complaint is justified. What really happened however was this: In several judicial proceedings the right of the Sukhavasis was negatived. In 1926, the Religious Endowments Board likewise refused to recognize the right. In 1927 the Devasthanam Committee, when considering the budget proposals, also declared against the right claimed; but in 1928 they revised their decision and resolved to make provision in the budget for payments to the Sukhavasis. Four out of the five trustees of the temple dissented from the Committee's view, and the plaintiffs as worshippers claim in the suit several reliefs including an injunction restraining the trustees and the members of the devasthanam committee from recognizing the right put forward by the Sukhavasi defendants. There is also a declaration that has been prayed for, but the prayers have been so worded as to suggest, as already stated, that the Sukhavasis are to be deprived of any share in the offerings.

Now that the misapprehension has been got rid of, does the provision referred to oppose any bar to the maintainability of the suit? S. 73 was in some respects recently amended; but the provision in force when the suit was filed, was as it stood before the amendment. For the present purpose, this makes little difference, and as the learned Judge rightly points out the reliefs mentioned in the section do not cover any of the reliefs claimed in the suit. It has been held by the Judicial Committee in 55 I A 96,[1] that the words 'further or other relief' in S. 92, Civil P. C. must on general principles of construction be taken to mean relief of the same nature as those described in Cls. (a) to (g). Both the reasoning and the conclusion of their Lordships applied to the provision in question, which has been modelled on the aforesaid section of the Code. It has been further held in the same case, that in enacting S. 92, the Legislature could not have intended to include relief against the third parties under the general words 'further or other relief'.

Applying the same reasoning, the question we have to decide is whether the words of the present provision can have the effect of abolishing or extinguishing substantive rights possessed under the law. As was pointed out in 57 Mad 362,[2] to which one of us was a party, there is a marked difference between the wording of the relevant part of S. 73 (3) and the corresponding portion of S. 92 (2). Under the latter provision, the suits contemplated are those filed claiming any of the relief specified in the section. But the words in the present Act are much wider and more comprehensive, for what is declared is, "No suit in respect of the administration or management of a religious endowment shall be instituted" except as provided by the Act. The learned Judge has held that as the reliefs claimed are not covered by those in the section, the suit does not lie. The short answer to that argument is, that the present suit is entirely outside the scope of S. 73. The suit, if its scope is properly understood, is not 'in respect of the administration or management' of the temple in question. The right of the trustees or the committee to make charitable doles—including the giving of doles to the Sukhavasi defendants—is not questioned; it is not sought to fetter their discretion in any way whatsoever. No question has been raised involving the 'administration' or 'management' of the temple either by the trustees or by the committee. What the plaintiffs seek is, to have their right declared as against certain third parties, that is to say, strangers to the trust (that being the true position of the Sukhavasis). Such a suit, it seems to us, does not come within the purview of S. 73 and cannot be said to be barred by its provisions. The further relief prayed for that the trustees and the members of the committee shall be restrained from giving and the Sukhavasis from receiving, is merely ancillary to and consequential upon the declaration. That in our opinion does not alter the main character of the suit. In this view, the obtaining by the plaintiffs of the sanction of the Board was a superfluous act; but that makes no difference.

The appeal is allowed and the plaintiffs will have a decree in the terms mentioned above. As to costs, the order made by the lower Court will stand, and in this Court the only order we propose to make is, that the plaintiffs will be paid a consolidated amount of Rs. 350 (Rupees three hundred and fifty only) as costs of the appeal from the temple funds. The memorandum of objections is dismissed. No costs.

Newsam J.—I agree entirely. There is nothing in S. 73 of Act 2 of 1927 to preclude the Court from granting a decree declaring that "Sukhavasis" are not as of right entitled to receive a fixed share of the prasadams and an injunction restraining the trustees from allowing such a claim by making cash payments to them as such or in lieu of any so-called vested interest in the offerings. On the findings of the learned trial Judge, which are unchallenged and which we accept, the plaintiffs must at least succeed to this extent. But obviously no decree can be passed restraining the right of the trustees to distribute prasadams by way of charity to any persons whom in their discretion they deem to be worthy recipients. S. 73, as I understand it, limits the powers of the Court to interfere with the administration and management of religious endowments and restricts the right of suit of persons interested to such matters as appointing and removing a trustee, vesting property in a trustee, determining what sum should be allocated to a particular purpose, and kindred matters. But for obvious reasons, Courts are prevented by this section from accepting any invitation to interfere with the details of administration or to fetter the discretion of trustees in minor matters. The machinery is provided in the Act itself for the control of trustees of temples by committees and by the Hindu Religious Endowments Board. I respectfully agree with my learned brother as to the terms of the decree which should be passed in this suit.

Civil Misc. Petn No. 171 of 1937, Decided on 21st October 1937, for review of Judgment of High Court, D/- 18th September 1936.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (9 of 1887), S. 25—No decree or order passed by trial Court—Only one issue decided by it—High Court cannot take action under S 25.

The High Court can only act under S 25 where a decree or order has been passed. Where no decree or order has been passed by the trial Court and all that it has done is to try only one of the issues, it is not open to the High Court to proceed under S. 25. [P 253 C 1]

V. C. Veeraraghavan for P. Chakrapani Ayyangar — for Respondent.

Leach C. J.—The petitioner was the plaintiff in a Small Cause suit in the District Munsif's Court of Salem in which he sued to recover a sum of Rs. 184-8-0 as damages from the Salem Municipality for wrongful distraint. There were three issues framed: the first was whether the suit was in time; the second had reference to the question of the illegality of the distraint; and the third concerned the question of damages. The District Munsif held that the suit was not barred by the law of limitation and adjourned the further hearing of the suit to another date. The respondent council then applied to this Court for an order revising this finding. The matter came before Cornish J., who held that the District Munsif was wrong in his decision on the question of limitation. The learned Judge found that the suit was time-barred and dismissed it. Unfortunately the petitioner was not represented at the hearing, and he applies for review of the order of Cornish J. on the ground that it is wrong and that this is seen from the record itself.

The contention is well founded. S. 25, Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, states that the High Court for the purpose of satisfying itself that a decree or order made in any case decided by a Court of Small Causes is according to law, may call for the case and pass such order with respect thereto as it thinks fit. The Court can only act under this section where a decree or order has been passed. In this case no decree or order had been passed. All that the District Munsif had done was to try one of the issues, and his decision meant that the suit had to proceed. It is therefore quite clear that there was no basis for the application which the Municipal Council made and the learned Judge was wrong in considering it. His order will therefore be vacated and the application of the Municipal Council dismissed. The suit will be tried by the District Munsif according to law. The petitioner is entitled to his costs.

Order.—This is a Letters Patent Appeal from the judgment of Jackson J. The decree of the trial Court dismissing the suit was confirmed by the Subordinate Judge. In second appeal to this Court, the plaintiff succeeded. The Munsif as well as the Subordinate Judge found that the defendants have no occupancy rights either under the Estates Land Act or independent of it, but nevertheless dismissed the suit on the ground that the plaintiff did not make out a right to eject. In second appeal Jackson J., accepted the findings of the lower Courts in regard to occupancy rights both within and outside the Act, but differing from the lower Courts held that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for possession. We have heard an argument from Mr. Venkataramana Rao on the question whether the plaintiff has or has not a right to eject, granting that the defendants are bound by the findings in regard to occupancy rights. On this point, on account of the course we propose to adopt, we wish to express no opinion at present. It is contended for the defendants that on the question of occupancy rights, the findings of the lower Appellate Court, as they stand, cannot be accepted. The first question in regard to those rights, which the learned Subordinate Judge had to decide was, was the grant made to the inamdar, the plaintiff's ancestor, of both the varams or of melvaram alone ? The learned Subordinate Judge whose finding on a question of fact is final, starts the discussion of the evidence with a wrong statement of the law. He says that there is a presumption that an inam grant comprises both the melvaram and the kudivaram. This is how he states the law :

The decisions of the Privy Council reported in 41 Mad 1012[1] and 43 Mad 166[2] are clear authorities to show that the presumption of law in the case of an inam grant was that both melvaram and kudivaram were granted. These two decisions were discussed in the Full Bench ruling in 44 Mad 588[3] and the same conclusions were arrived at. It lay, therefore, on the defendants who set up occupancy rights that only the melvaram was given to the original grantee and that they had permanent rights of occupancy in the lands. Such a presumption of law is not rebutted in this case.

1. Suryanarayana v. Patanna, (1918) 5 A I R P C 169=48 I C 689=45 I A 209=41 Mad 1012 (P C).
2. Venkatasastrulu v. D. Seetharamadu, (1919) 6 A I R P C 111=51 I C 304=43 Mad 166=46 I A 123 (P C).

This was the view of the law taken at that time by the Madras High Court and the Subordinate Judge was bound to give effect to that view. He is not therefore to blame for the course he adopted. But since then, the Privy Council has clearly held that the view taken by our Court in the Full Bench case referred to by the Subordinate Judge is wrong. In 49 I A 286,[4] the Judicial Committee laid down the law thus in unequivocal terms :

> It will be noticed that neither in 45 I A 209[1] nor in 47 I A 76[5] is there a suggestion of a presumption in favour of the inamdar or pattadar on the one side or the ryot on the other. It was further distinctly pointed out in 46 I A 123[2] at p. 128, the passage already cited, that each case must be considered on its own facts.
> A Full Bench of the Madras High Court however has in a recent case, 44 Mad 588,[3] held that underlying the exposition of their Lordships, such an initial presumption is to be inferred. Their Lordships cannot help observing that in drawing this inference the learned Judges are clearly in error. Each case must be dealt with upon its own facts, with special regard to the evidence and circumstances therein.

The question then is, does the wrong assumption of the lower Appellate Court vitiate its finding or not ? We entirely agree that it is not incumbent upon the Appellate Court to repeat in extenso the arguments of the trial Judge which it accepts. But the party is entitled to a considered opinion of the appellate tribunal. It is not the first Court's view but that of the second Court that is final if the question is one of fact. In this case the point is either one of fact or is a mixed question of law and fact. The discussion of the Subordinate Judge is extremely brief and we are not entitled to speculate that, if he had applied the right rule of law, he would still have agreed with the District Munsif. On the contrary, the Subordinate Judge, while pointing out that the presumption may be rebutted, observes that on the facts of the present case it was not. What view he would have taken of the evidence, if he had not approached it from a totally wrong standpoint, we are not in a position to say. First, as regards, therefore, occupancy rights within the Act, we set aside the finding in para. 7 of the judgment of the lower Appellate Court.

Then as regards occupancy rights independent of the Act, the judgment of the Subordinate Judge is equally open to attack. The District Munsif in a judgment unnecessarily long, devotes several paragraphs to the discussion of the question ; have the defendants made out their case with reference to a lost grant or usage or prescription ? Under each of these headings, he considers the question. The Subordinate Judge completely misunderstands the District Munsif. There are just three lines in his judgment which bear on this point and his reasoning and conclusion are contained in this short passage. We may quote his very words :

> The lower Court also showed in para. 22 of its judgment that the defendant could not have obtained permanent rights by prescription, I hold therefore that the defendants had no occupancy rights : Para. 9.

Is this not a thorough misunderstanding of the judgment of the trial Court ? The Subordinate Judge has overlooked the discussion on the question of lost grant as also on the question of usage. Even on the point of prescription, he has nothing more to say than that he agrees with the lower Court. It is impossible to accept this finding as final in a second appeal. We therefore set aside that finding also. We call upon the lower Appellate Court to rehear the appeal in regard to these two questions and write a fresh judgment containing findings as regards existence of occupancy rights within and independent of the Act, on the evidence already on the record. Findings shall be returned in six weeks from this date. Objections 10 days thereafter. All the questions that arise in the appeal will be argued on the receipt of the findings.

D sold a piece of land to P and in his sale deed failed to disclose prior encumbrances on the land. The mortgagee whose debts had not been disclosed got the property sold in execution of his decree and P purchased it through a benamidar K. P later on sued D for damages falsely alleging that K had purchased the property and dispossessed him. The suit was dismissed on the ground that the cause of action alleged therein was false. P again sued D for damages for having been compelled to pay money to mortgagee to prevent his dispossession. D contended that the suit was barred under O. 2, R. 2 :

Held that the second suit was not barred under O. 2, R. 2. Although the two causes of action arose out of the breach of one covenant in the sale deed, there were two distinct and independent events referred to in the two suits—in the first, that the plaintiff had been dispossessed and in the second, that on a date anterior to the allegation in the first suit he was compelled to pay off the mortgagee's claim to prevent his dispossession. P could not have filed one suit on the two causes of action because the facts alleged in the two suits were entirely inconsistent with one another and the two claims could not have been tried together in the same suit : 1 I C 319, Disting.

The mere fact that there are encumbrances on the property sold which have not been disclosed does not give the vendee a cause of action. It is only when he is dispossessed or is compelled to pay some money that he ought not to have been called upon to pay that a cause of action arises.

K. V. Sesha Iyengar — for Appellants.

N. R. Govindachari — for Respondent.

Judgment. — The defendant sold a piece of land to the plaintiff and in his sale deed failed to disclose some prior encumbrances. The mortgagees, whose debts had not been disclosed, brought suits for sale, with the result that the property that had been sold to the plaintiff and was actually in his possession was brought to sale in execution of one of the decrees, and the plaintiff himself purchased the property through a benamidar, Kaliyanandi Chettiar. Instead of bringing a suit for damages as a result of his having been compelled to pay the decree debt, he falsely pleaded in O. S. No. 521 of 1930 that Kaliyanandi Chettiar had purchased this land and had dispossessed the plaintiff. The District Munsif found that the plaintiff's statements of fact were false, but he nevertheless gave a decree because a breach of the covenant had occurred and the plaintiff had suffered damages. In appeal the Subordinate Judge rightly pointed out that the plaintiff's case as it stood, was a false one and that his suit had either to be dismissed or the lower Court would have to allow the plaintiff to amend his plaint. The Subordinate Judge did not say and could not say that the District Munsif should have suggested to the plaintiff that his plaint should be amended and that if the plaintiff had followed up the suggestion the amendment should have been allowed. The amendment of the plaint could not have been allowed ; for, if it had, it would have altered the whole nature of the suit. That suit having been dismissed, the plaintiff has brought the present suit on the true cause of action, viz. his having been compelled to pay a sum of money to the mortgagee in order to prevent his dispossession. It is now contended by the defendant that because of the prohibition in O. 2, R. 2 the plaintiff's suit must be dismissed as in the prior suit he should have put forward the very claim that he has put forward now.

Mr. Sesha Iyengar for the appellants has placed a considerable reliance on 1 I C 319[1] in which it was held that if a number of covenants of a contract are broken, the breaches of that contract may be sued on in the same suit, and that if the plaintiff sued on one cause of action only he is prevented by O. 2, R. 2 from bringing a fresh suit on the other causes of action. There can be no doubt at all that the principle there laid down was correct:

1. Rajah Bahadur Shiv Lal v. Raja Veppa Pampanna, (1909) 1 I C 319=11 Bom L R 46.

but it can only be applied to cases where breaches of the several covenants in the contract occur in the course of the same transaction. If in the present case the defendant had covenanted to give peaceful possession and enjoyment to the plaintiff and at the same time had guaranteed that the land was free from encumbrances, and the plaintiff had afterwards been dispossessed, then it would have been incumbent on him to have filed a suit on the breach of both the covenants for peaceful possession and for a title free from encumbrances. If however the two covenants were broken on two different occasions, then there will have been two causes of action and two suits would be maintainable. In the present case there was only one covenant or at any rate only one covenant has been referred to in the judgments of the Courts below and in the arguments of the learned counsel for the appellants viz. the covenant that the land was free from encumbrances. There are however two distinct and independent events referred to in the two suits. In the first suit, the plaintiff stated that he had been dispossessed and his dispossession was a cause of action ; while in the second suit he stated that at a time anterior to the date on which he had formerly said that he was dispossessed, he was compelled to pay off the mortgagee's claims. There were thus two causes of action, although they arose out of breaches of the same covenant. As Mr. Sesha Iyengar has himself pointed out, the mere fact that there are encumbrances which have not been disclosed does not give a vendee a cause of action. It is only when he is dispossessed or is compelled to pay some money that he ought not to have been called upon to pay, that a cause of action arises. There were therefore two distinct causes of action in the two suits.

This is sufficient to dispose of the appeal; but it has been argued that the test to be applied is whether the plaintiff could have filed one suit on the two causes of action. Even if this is the test the appellant would fail ; for, the plaintiff clearly could not have done this as the facts alleged in the two suits were entirely inconsistent with one another. He could not in the same suit have said that Kaliyanandi Chettiar had purchased the land and that he had been dispossessed and in another paragraph have said that he purchased the land himself and was never dispossessed. It is therefore clear that the two claims could not have been tried together in the same suit. The present suit was therefore maintainable and this appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—In our opinion the learned Subordinate Judge took the correct view both as to the general principle and as to the particular case. There may have been some divergence of view in this Court in the past, as Mr. Patanjali Sastri contends, but latterly the trend of the decisions has undoubtedly been towards the view that once a decree settling a scheme has been passed, the Court has done its duty and is not to be called upon in the execution department to make the scheme work : vide 59 Mad 751.[1] With due respect to the learned Judges who have taken the other view, we think this is correct, and see no sufficient reason to accept Mr. M. Patanjali Sastri's suggestion that the case should be laid before a Full Bench.

In this case before us, we agree with the learned Subordinate Judge that the decree itself does not even purport to be executable. It provides in para. 4 that the Manager shall deposit the Kattalai funds (over Rs. 1000) in a bank, but it makes no provision for the decision of any dispute between the Manager and the hukdar as to the amount due to be deposited. In para. 9 it is ordered that there shall be an annual audit but no provision is made for scrutiny of the auditor's report by the Court or for enforcing any conclusions arrived at by the auditor or the Court. As the learned Subordinate Judge observes there is nothing of an executable character in either para. 4 or para. 9 of the decree. This appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 407 of 1931 and Civil Revn. Petn. No. 1695 of 1930, Decided on 19th August 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Tellicherry, in O. S. No. 20 of 1928.

(a) Res Judicata — Bar of—Suit by person filling dual position of karnavan of tarwad and uralan of dewaswom against another shrine claiming homage including certain payments from defendant shrine — Same relief claimed in previous suit—But in previous suit uralan figuring as plaintiff suing through dewaswom, while in latter suit, dewaswom figuring as plaintiff suing through the uralan — Both suits identically same — Parties to both suits cannot be regarded as different parties — Subsequent suit is barred by res judicata.

Where a suit is brought by a person filling the dual position of the karnavan of a tarwad and the uralan of a dewaswom against another shrine claiming that the defendant shrine is a subsidiary shrine owing allegiance to its suzerain—the plaintiff dewaswom—and bound to render it homage inter alia by making certain recurring payments and where another suit was previously instituted against the same shrine claiming the same relief but in the previous suit the trustee, i. e. the uralan figured as plaintiff suing on behalf of the institution and in the latter suit the institution figures as plaintiff suing through its trustee (who happens to be the same person in both suits) and the right put forward by the trustee was, in both the suits on behalf of the dewaswom and not in his capacity as the karnavan of his tarwad and not only are the two shrines plaintiff and defendant respectively in both the suits but are represented by the same individual and the reliefs claimed in both suits are not only substantially but identically the same, the parties in both the suits cannot be said to be different parties and the latter suit is barred by the principle of res judicata: A I R 1925 P C 139 and A I R 1927 P C 128. Disting. [P 258 C 2 ; P 259 C 1]

(b) Res Judicata—Constructive—S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, and S. 21, Civil P. C., embody principle of res judicata—Suit instituted in Court having no pecuniary jurisdiction to try it—No objection raised by either party as regards jurisdiction of Court to try suit—Parties are precluded in subsequent suit between them, based on same cause of action, and involving same relief from contending that subsequent suit is not barred as former suit was tried by Court having no pecuniary jurisdiction to try it.

Section 11, Suits Valuation Act, and S. 21, Civil P. C. embody the principle of constructive res judicata and propound that unless objection to the pecuniary or territorial jurisdiction of a Court is taken by the parties at the earliest possible opportunity and unless the want of jurisdiction has resulted in failure of justice, the principle of constructive res judicata will apply. Where a suit is instituted in a Court which has no pecuniary jurisdiction to try it and no objection is raised by the parties as regards the jurisdiction of the Court to try the suit and the suit is tried and decided by the Court, it cannot be contended by either party in a subsequent suit between the same parties based on the same cause of action and claiming the same relief that the subsequent suit is not barred merely because the former suit was tried by a Court which had no pecuniary jurisdiction to try it unless it is shown that the want of jurisdiction has resulted in failure of justice. The principle of constructive res judicata will apply in such case : A I R 1920 Mad 1019 (F B) ; A I R 1925 Mad 117 ; A I R 1926 Mad 421 ; A I R 1927 Mad 627 ; A I R 1929 Lah 449 and A I R 1924 All 388, Rel. on ; Case law discussed. [P 262 C 1]

(c) Suits Valuation Act (1887), S. 11—S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, and S. 21, Civil P. C., are exceptions to fundamental rule of law that judgment of Court without jurisdiction is nullity and that want of jurisdiction cannot be waived.

Per Venkatasubba Rao J. — Section 11, Suits Valuation Act, and S. 21, Civil P. C., are exceptions to the fundamental rule of law that a judgment of Court without jurisdiction is a nullity and that want of jurisdiction cannot be waived. The principle which both the sections embody is that these defects are not fundamental in character and are no more than mere irregularities in the exercise of jurisdiction. [P 259 C 2; P 261 C 1]

(d) Jurisdiction—Objection to.

An objection to jurisdiction which a defendant is precluded from raising is not open to a party who was the plaintiff in the previous suit. [P 261 C 1]

(e) Res Judicata —Applicability —Principle cannot be evaded by literal and narrow application of special section.

The fundamental principle of res judicata that no litigant can ever have the same case tried twice is not to be evaded by a literal and a narrow application of a special section. [P 262 C 2]

Advocate General and P. Govinda Menon — for Appellants.

T. R. Venkatarama Sastri, M. C. Sridharan and C. Govindan — for Respondents.

Venkatasubba Rao J. — The question raised in this appeal is whether the present suit is barred by res judicata by reason of the decree in O. S. No. 847 of 1923. The bar that is pleaded is not confined to any particular matter in issue but extends to the entire claim. The suit has been brought by one Rayarappan Nambiar, who fills the dual position of (1) the karnavan of Karakath Idam and (2) the Uralan of Kadamberi Dewaswom where the presiding deity is Bhagavati; in other words, the plaintiff's right to hold the trusteeship of the temple arises from his being the manager of his tarwad. Several reliefs are claimed in the plaint, over what is alleged to be a subsidiary shrine known as Muttappan Devestanam, under the control of one Valia Ramunni, the karnavan of a Thiya Tarwad, and as such, the 'Mattyan' or the head, of the shrine in question. The plaintiff's case shortly is that the defendant shrine is a subsidiary temple owing allegiance to its suzerain, the Kadamberi Dewaswom, and bound to render it homage inter alia by making certain recurring payments. There are some other reliefs which are claimed, to which it will become necessary to refer presently. The question is, whether either of the two grounds taken by the learned Advocate-General is well founded, namely first that the parties to the present and the previous suit are different and secondly that the previous suit was tried by a Court which had no jurisdiction to try it. As to the former contention, it is urged that in the present action the right put forward is that of the deity, whereas in the previous suit, the karnavan was asserting his private or individual right. The argument however proceeds upon a thorough misreading of the two plaints. There has been disingenuous attempt in the plaint to make it appear that the present claim differs from the old one which however has not succeeded. In spite of the wilful confusion that has been introduced, the two claims are not only substantially but identically the same. On the previous occasion, the trustee was described as the plaintiff suing on behalf of the institution; in the present plaint, the institution figures as the plaintiff suing through its trustee. This is a distinction without a difference; even otherwise, almost every paragraph of the previous plaint shows that the right put forward by Rayarappan Nambiar (the same person as the present plaintiff) was then, as now, on behalf of the Devaswom and not in his capacity as the karnavan of his tarwad. The matter is so patent and so manifest that it would be a waste of time to refer in any detail to the relevant passages. Not only were these two very shrines the plaintiff and the defendant in the previous suit, but they happened to be represented by the same individuals as at present. I fail to see what principle can be deduced from either of the two cases cited by the learned Advocate-General, which can possibly be applied to the facts here. In the first case, 52 I A 245,[1] all that was held was, that a Hindu idol is a 'juristic entity' and has a juridical status with the power of suing and being sued.

The conception of a family idol as a moveable chattel, capable of being treated as property, is not warranted by the authorities and is opposed to principle; that is the gist of the decision. There was a dispute in regard to a right claimed by one of the parties, to remove the idol from the allotted place of worship, and the only matter decided was, that there was a broader question, which the action raised, than the mere establishment of individual rights, namely that relating to the interests of the deity. It was therefore held that a disinterested third party, other than either of the contesting claimants should act as the next friend of, and appear for, the idol. It is difficult to discover any principle laid down here applicable to the facts of the present case. Nor does the second case cited, 54 I A 238,[2] appear to have any application. The question turned entirely on the construction of the pleadings in the earlier litigation. Both the plaintiffs and the defendants had been described as the shebaits of the gods and the Judicial Committee naturally enough found it difficult to treat the idol as the party (p. 245). Their Lordships expressly declare that owing to the nature of the earlier litigation, it was not thought necessary to make the gods, the plaintiffs in the subsequent suit, parties to the previous suits (p. 246). The facts here as already shown are entirely different. The former suit, as the present one, was filed on behalf of the Kadamberi Devaswom and in both the suits the plaintiff is virtually the goddess Bhagavati, the deity in that temple. The contention therefore that the operation of res judicata is excluded by reason of the parties being different entirely fails.

Now turning to the second contention, it is based on a totally wrong assumption. There is a relief claimed in the present plaint (that is the one material to the present contention), namely that the defendant should be directed to surrender the land where the temple stands, along with the improvements effected thereon. In the plaint, the value of the buildings inclusive of the improvements, has been stated to be upwards of Rs. 13,000. There is a definite averment made in para. 3 (vi) that the plaintiff is entitled to the improvements without being liable to pay for them. Now the learned Advocate General says that in the former suit also a similar claim had been made. There has been some debate as to the correct rendering of of the relief No. (a) in the previous plaint (see p. 194, documents paper) but whichever of the two rival renderings is accepted, it is clear that there was no claim made in the earlier suit to the improvements. On the contrary, there is a definite offer in the former plaint to pay for the improvements, in the alternative, the plaint goes on to say that the defendant should be directed to demolish and remove the buildings which constitute the improvements. Surely, this cannot be construed as a claim to improvements, which naturally enough were not even valued in that plaint. Upon the claim made and upon the valuation given of the reliefs, the Court that had jurisdiction was the Munsif's Court and the suit was rightly filed and tried by that Court. Now on these facts, it is perfectly obvious that the present claim to the improvements is barred either under S. 11, Expln. (4), Civil P. C., or under O. 2, R. 2. It is in order to get over this difficulty that the learned Advocate General has been constrained to contend, quite wrongly as I have said, that even in the previous plaint the improvements had been claimed. The next step in his argument is, that the former suit, understood as comprising a claim to the improvements, was beyond the pecuniary jurisdiction of the District Munsif who tried it ; the decision in such a suit is incompetent and cannot operate as res judicata.

Granting for a moment that the construction sought to be placed upon the previous plaint is correct, is the learned Advocate-General's contention valid in law ? It is a fundamental rule that a judgment of a Court without jurisdiction is a nullity and that want of jurisdiction cannot be waived. To this rule there are two exceptions recognized by the Indian Law: S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, deals with defects of jurisdiction due to wrong pecuniary valuation and S. 21, Civil P. C. makes a like provision when the place of suing has been wrongly chosen. Put in another way, there is a distinction between inherent incompetency in a Court and irregular exercise of jurisdiction and under the Indian Statute Law, the two defects mentioned above are treated as irregularities which can be waived. The argument pressed upon us, that beyond the terms of the two sections, the exceptions they embody can have no operation. This contention has been overruled in regard to S. 21, Civil P. C. by several decisions of our Court. In 43 Mad 675,[3] it was held that the objection to jurisdiction having been waived, the waiver extends to execution proceedings. In that case a wrong Court passed the final mortgage decree without objection and when it was sought to be executed, the defendant objected to its validity. Sir John Wallis C. J. delivering the judgment of the Full Bench, held that the effect of S. 21 is that objections which the Appellate or revisional Court is precluded from allowing, must be considered cured for all purposes. In 47 M L J 448[4] the Court which passed the final decree without objection had ceased to have jurisdiction over the mortgaged property. In a suit brought to set aside the decree on the ground that it was void for want of jurisdiction, it was held that S. 21, Civil P. C., enacts an exception to the general rule and that the plea of want of territorial jurisdiction may be waived. As I observed then, if in appeal or revision the decree cannot be impeached, it stands to reason that it should not be allowed to be attacked in a subsequent suit brought to set it aside (p. 459). This was the view taken by Phillips J. and myself, but as we differed on a question of fact, there was a Letters Patent appeal filed. Two of the Judges who heard it agreed with our view although the other member refrained from expressing any opinion. In 49 Mad 746,[5] the sale of the mortgaged property was ordered without objection by a Court which had ceased to possess territorial jurisdiction. The validity of the sale was assailed by the judgment-debtor in an application subsequently made by him to set it aside. After referring to S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, and S. 21 of Civil P. C., I went on to observe :

> By virtue of these sections, certain defects of jurisdiction are put on a par with 'irregularities in the initial procedure'. In regard to the pecuniary jurisdiction of a Court, S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, and in regard to its territorial jurisdiction S. 21, Civil P. C., recognize that there may be a waiver on the part of the defendant and that the absence of jurisdiction does not render the decree a nullity : see p. 750.

In this case it will be seen that the principle of waiver was pushed much further than in the two cases already noticed; the objection waived was not to the "place of suing" to which alone S. 21 refers, the defect of jurisdiction having occurred in the course of execution. In 50 Mad 882,[6] the principle laid down in the two last mentioned cases was affirmed, the Court holding that the omission to object to jurisdiction estopped the mortgagor from disputing the validity of the final decree. The learned Judges further held a point with which we are not here concerned that though the final decree could not be attacked, the mortgagor was not estopped from objecting to the jurisdiction of the Court to order a sale, meaning presumably that the objection could be taken before the sale was ordered but not after the event. The principle laid down in 47 M L J 448[4] has been adopted by the Lahore High Court in A I R 1929 Lah 449,[7] where it is observed that S. 21 creates what may be called a statutory waiver of the objection to jurisdiction so far as it relates to the place of suing. The learned Advocate-General seeks support for his argument in some decisions of the Calcutta High Court to which Mukherjee J. was a party. After referring to the exception created by the two sections mentioned above the learned Judges (Mukherjee and Chotzner JJ.) observe :

> This exception cannot obviously be so interpreted as to have wider application than what is justified by its terms: 27 C W N 542[8] at page 547.

In that case, in execution of a decree certain property was sold by a Court which had no jurisdiction over it. A subsequent suit by the purchaser for recovering the property was dismissed on the ground that the sale had been held by a Court without jurisdiction. This decision, it will be seen, is in direct opposition to 49 Mad 746[5] already cited. There is yet an earlier case of the Calcutta High Court, 38 Cal 639,[9] which is frequently cited in this connexion. There owing to the undervaluation of the suit, the appeal was heard by the District Court, instead of by the High Court, which passed a decree by consent. In a subsequent suit brought for a declaration that the consent decree was a nullity, the learned Judges, Mukherjee J. being one of them, observed:

> If a Court has no jurisdiction, its judgment is not merely voidable but void, and it is wholly unimportant how precisely certain and technically correct its proceedings and decisions may have been.

This statement, so far as it goes, is with great respect, unexceptionable, and the real question that arose in the case, as the judgment itself points out, was whether a stranger was bound by the decree in question. The learned Judges say:

> We are not now called upon to consider what the effect of such lack of jurisdiction would be upon the decree, in so far as the parties thereto were concerned : Page 668.

There is nothing in the positive language of this judgment which supports the contention. A Bench of the Allahabad High Court was in favour of preferring the narrower view of the principle underlying S. 21 and refused to follow the Madras decisions: 53 All 560.[10] Finally, it may be pointed out that in Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, the learned author expresses the opinion that the Madras view is sounder in principle than that taken in the decision referred to above to which Mukherjee J. was a party (Commentaries under S. 21). To treat want of territorial or pecuniary jurisdiction as amounting to inherent incompetency seems incompatible with the idea underlying the two statutory provisions mentioned above. These sections provide that even had the objection not been waived, that is to say had been taken in the Court of first instance, the presence of a further element is essential, namely that there has been a consequent failure of justice. The principle that they appear to embody is, that these defects of jurisdiction are not fundamental in character and are no more than "irregularities in the exercise of jurisdiction." 50 Mad 882,[6] decided by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee, does not, as explained in several cases, lend the slightest support to the Advocate General's contention. The general rule, as already stated, is that consent cannot give jurisdiction; but Ss. 21 and 11 provide exceptions to that rule. The effect of that decision is, that the operation of S. 21 of the Code being excluded in the case of scheduled districts where the lands were situated, the objection was not to the nullity of the order on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

That territorial and pecuniary jurisdiction stand in this respect on the same footing has not been disputed, although most of the decided cases refer to the principle embodied in S. 21 alone. However there is a direct decision of the Allahabad High Court, where the question was one of pecuniary jurisdiction, which supports our view: 46 All 250.[11] Finally, this case differs from the usual type, as it was the plaintiff himself who on the former occasion invoked the jurisdiction of what he now contends was the wrong Court: see 47 M L J 448.[4] An objection which a defendant is precluded from raising, is a fortiori not open to the party who was the plaintiff in the previous suit. In the result, the contention of the learned Advocate-General that the present suit is not barred by res judicata fails. The lower Court, although it came to the conclusion that the suit was barred by res judicata, went into issues of fact and recorded findings against the plaintiff. We should have also dealt with the questions of fact raised but for the statement of the learned Advocate-General filed in Court, to the effect that in the view we have taken on the point of res judicata, the merits of the case need not be gone into.

Lastly remains the application made by the plaintiff to the lower Court under O. 2, R. 4, Civil P. C. which has been disallowed by that Court. This forms also the subject of C. R. P. No. 1695 of 1930 posted before us along with this appeal. We substantially agree with the reasons given by the lower Court. Moreover it would be futile for the plaintiff to urge that to the main claim obviously barred by res judicata, he should be permitted to tack on other claims of a subordinate nature. In the result, both the appeal and the C. R. P. are dismissed with costs. Under R. 46 (2), Appellate Side Rules, we allow in the appeal two sets of fees, the respondent having been represented by more than one counsel. The counsel's fee in the C. R. P. is fixed at Rs. 25.

Newsam J.—It was practically admitted and indeed it would be extremely difficult to deny that the two suits are between the same parties and that the identical reliefs were prayed for in both suits. In both, the plaintiff sues in a dual capacity as karnavan of his family (tarwad) and Uralan (owner and manager) of the goddess Bhagavathi and her property. Both suits were inspired by feudal intolerance and flavoured with the jealousy of a goddess. Both were brought with a view to the suppression of a lesser deity, owned and managed by the karnavan of a so-called upstart family, inferior in caste, prestige and status to the plaintiffs. Though both the plaintiff devaswom and the defendant institution have been declared to be public temples, it is indeed almost inconceivable to the karnavan of a Malabar family that a temple built by his ancestors on the family paramba should ever be anything but family property. Even a cursory analysis of the plaints will show that both suits are identical.

The real argument was that the present suit is not barred because the former suit was tried by a Court which had no pecuniary jurisdiction to try it. It will be assumed for this purpose that if the plaintiff appellant had valued the former suit properly it would have been a suit beyond the pecuniary jurisdiction of a District Munsif. S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, as I understand it, applies the major principle of constructive res judicata to suits valuation, just as S. 21, Civil P. C. applies that same principle to the question of the territorial jurisdiction of Courts. These two matters are primarily the province of parties; within limits a party may choose his own forum, e. g. by undervaluing or overvaluing his claim or by suing in one District or in another. That being so, S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, and S. 21, Civil P. C., propound the salutary and indeed quite inevitable maxim that unless objection to the pecuniary or territorial jurisdiction of a Court is taken by the parties at the earliest possible opportunity, the principle of constructive res judicata will apply. That is to say, the objection may not be taken at any later stage in the suit. And even if the objection is taken at the earliest possible moment and overruled, it cannot prevail in appeal unless such want of jurisdiction has materially affected the result. From this, it is obvious that the jurisdiction of a Court is only artificially limited by minor considerations such as the value of the suit or the place where the cause of action arose. Inherent defects stand on an entirely different footing. For example, if a Court not empowered to grant divorces were to pass a decree nisi, its decree would be void ab initio. Such inherent want of jurisdiction is not curable by consent of parties. But, as I have said, parties have been given a limited right to choose the forum which shall hear their causes and when once they have chosen they must abide by their choice. If it were otherwise, Courts would be at the mercy of parties, litigant, would become mere arenas for preliminary trials of strength. It has been argued further that S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, and S. 21, Civil P. C., must be strictly construed. They bar the plea being taken in the subsequent stages of the same suit; but do not in terms bar another suit. This argument I have already answered. As soon as it is realized that these two sections are applications of the general principle of constructive res judicata to the valuation of suits and to the place of suing, it becomes rather absurd to attempt to detract from a principle so wide and universal as the rule of res judicata. Indeed if the plea is barred in subsequent stages of the same suit it necessarily follows a fortiori that another suit is barred. The suggestion made really amounts to this—that these two sections merely render the first suit in all its stages meaningless, empty and theoretical, while leaving it open to the parties to file another and a real suit. That is a fantastic interpretation. No litigant can ever have the same case tried twice. That is the fundamental principle of res judicata, not to be evaded by a literal and a narrow interpretation of a special section. I agree with my learned brother on all points and in the decree proposed.

Govt. Pleader — for the Government.

Leach C. J. — The following question has been referred to the Court under S. 57 of the Stamp Act, by the Board of Revenue as the Chief Controlling Revenue Authority of the Presidency:

Whether the document, a security bond for Rs. 4500 executed in pursuance of an order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Tiruvarur, hypothecating also immovable property, should be stamped under Art. 40 of Sch. 1, or under Art. 57 of Sch. 1, Stamp Act.

These Articles correspond respectively to Arts. 33 and 46, Madras Stamp Amendment Act of 1922. The facts are shortly these. One Abubacker Labbai applied in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Tiruvarur under the Provincial Insolvency Act to be adjudged an insolvent, and under S. 21 (1) of that Act was required to give a bond with two sureties for his due appearance in the insolvency proceedings. A bond was accordingly executed by two sureties in favour of the sheristadar of the Court in the sum of Rs. 4500 and was stamped under Art. 57, Stamp Act, or rather, under the corresponding Article of the Local Act. The Central Board of Revenue have asked the Court to decide whether this is correct. If Art. 57 does not apply, the only other Article which can, is Art. 40. This is common ground.

Article 40 prescribes the duty to be paid on a mortgage deed not being an agreement relating to deposit of title deeds, pawn or pledge, a bottomry bond, a mortgage of a crop, a respondentia bond and a security bond. Art. 57 prescribes the duty payable in respect of a security bond or mortgage deed executed by way of security for the due execution of an office, or to account for money or other property received by virtue thereof, or executed by a surety to secure the due performance of a contract. It is said that Art. 57, and not Art. 40, applies because the bond in question is a surety bond for the due performance of a contract. S. 2 (h), Contract Act, defines a contract as being an agreement enforceable by law.

The Lahore High Court held in 17 Lah 74,[1] that a bond of this nature is a bond for the due performance of a contract and consequently is to be stamped under Art. 57. In that case the bond differed materially from the bond we are now considering. The bond in the present reference was not executed by the debtor, but merely by the sureties. In the Lahore case, the bond was executed by the debtor as well as the sureties. This decision followed a previous decision of the Lahore Court in 15 Lah 78,[2] which concerned a bond given under O. 41, R. 5, Civil P. C.

The Allahabad High Court has taken a contrary view : 52 All 844.[3] A Full Bench consisting of Kendell, Young and King JJ. held that the bond given under O. 41, R. 5, was not a bond for the due performance of a contract, because there could be no contractual relation with the Court. An agreement amounting to a contract must be entered into by the parties with the object of creating contractual relations between themselves and this was impossible when the Court was concerned. A Bench of the Calcutta High Court in 40 C W N 1281[4] expressed a similar opinion, and expressly held that the word 'contract' used in Art. 57 means a contract as defined in S. 2 (h), Contract Act.

We agree with the decisions of the Allahabad and Calcutta High Courts. As the Privy Council pointed out in 46 I A 228=42 All 158,[5] the Court is not a juridical person and is incapable of contracting. Moreover in circumstances such as these there is nothing in the nature of a contract with the Court. When a debtor applies to be adjudicated an insolvent, he is required by law to attend before the Insolvency Court when required. It is not a matter of agreement ; it is his duty to be there and if he does not attend when he should attend, the Court can compel his attendance. In this case the sureties did bind themselves to the sheristadar that the insolvent would attend when called upon, but their obligation was not an obligation connected with the performance of a contract by the insolvent. For the reasons indicated, we are of the opinion that Art. 40, not Art. 57, is the appropriate Article. We answer the reference accordingly.

Ayimbati Thottathil Narikkot Cheriya Krishnan Nayar — Appellant.

Puthan Peetikayil Charichil Pallikkal Moideen and others — Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 587 of 1936, Decided on 29th September 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, North Malabar, in A. S. No. 240 of 1935.

Malabar Tenancy Act (14 of 1930), S. 33— Tenant—Power of purchasing landlord's rights — Tenant being mortgagor with lease back — —Tenant can redeem portion of mortgaged property — No distinction made between ordinary tenant and tenant being mortgagor with lease back.

Under S. 33, Malabar Tenancy Act, a tenant has the right to purchase the landlord's right in the property in his occupation. The Legislature probably did not intend the section to protect the tenant who was a mortgagor with a lease back of the property. Yet if provisions of law made by the Legislature actually apply to a case, Courts cannot avoid giving effect to them merely because the Legislature did not contemplate such an application. If under S. 33, a tenant is given a right to redeem a portion of the mortgage only, he cannot lose his rights because it is probable that the Legislature did not have such a case in mind when they drew up the present Act. The definition of 'kudiyuruppu' in S. 3 (m) and of 'tenant' in S. 3 (v) and S. 33 do not distinguish an ordinary tenant from a tenant who is a mortgagor with a lease back. And although in some respects the mortgage and the lease back may be considered to be one transaction, yet they operate separately and a tenant is nonetheless a tenant because he is also the mortgagor and provisions of S. 33, are applicable to him. [P 264 C 2]

P. Govinda Menon — for Appellant.

Judgment.—The appellant usufructuarily mortgaged certain property to one Moosan, the predecessor-in-title of the respondents. On the same day the land was leased back to the appellant; and so the appellant retained possession of the whole of the property mortgaged. Subsequently, he sub-leased a greater portion of the property to defendant 5. The respondents then brought a suit to eviot the appellant from the suit plot, whereupon the appellant put in an application under S. 33, Malabar Tenancy Act, to purchase the landlord's right in the property in his occupation. The trial Court found that all the requirements of S. 33 had been satisfied and allowed the petition. In appeal the District Judge felt that the Legislature could not have intended enabling a mortgagor, in circumstances like the present, to avoid his mortgage by a transaction of this kind and that S. 33 was intended to protect tenants, who had long been in possession and had been forced to construct houses or buildings, from eviction from those buildings. He therefore allowed the appeal and dismissed the petition. Hence this appeal by the present appellant.

It is with a great deal of reluctance that I have to disagree with the learned District Judge, because I think he is right in his opinion that the Legislature did not intend to protect tenants of this kind. As a mortgagor he ought in equity to be compelled to redeem the whole of the mortgage. By putting in this application under S. 33, he is enabled to redeem only a portion of the mortgage and thus to avoid the ordinary provisions of the law. However even if the Legislature did not intend S. 33 to be applied to a case where the tenant was the mortgagor of property leased back to him, yet if provisions of law made by the Legislature actually apply to a case, Courts cannot avoid giving effect to them merely because the Legislature did not contemplate such an application. If the appellant, under the plain wording of S. 33, is given a right to redeem a portion of the mortgage only, he cannot lose his rights because it is probable that the Legislature did not have such a case in mind when they drew up the present Act. I have read carefully the definitions of 'kudiyiruppu' in S. 3 (m) and of 'tenant' in S. 3 (v) and S. 33, and I find myself unable to distinguish the present case from one in which the tenant was not also the mortgagor. If A had mortgaged the property to Moosan and Moosan had leased it to the appellant, who subsequently subleased a part of it to defendant 5, then undoubtedly the appellant would have the right under S. 33 that he claims; and the relation of the appellant to Moosan and his successors seems to me to be precisely the same as it would have been if the mortgagor had not been the appellant. Although in some respects the mortgage and the lease back may be considered to be one transaction, yet undoubtedly they operate separately and the appellant was nonetheless a tenant because he was also the mortgagor. The appeal is therefore allowed with costs in this Court and in the lower Appellate Court and the order of the District Munsif restored.

Decided on 6th December 1937.

 Legal Practitioners Act (1879), S. 13 — Misconduct—Suggesting bribe to be offered to officials is grave misconduct—Fact that proceedings were instituted as result of grudge makes no difference in gravity of offence.

For a member of the Bar to suggest that an official or any one should be bribed amounts to professional misconduct and professional misconduct of grave nature. The fact that bribes of this nature have been given by others is no excuse. Leach C. J. — Mr. N. G., a pleader, practising in the Court of the District Munsif of Mannargudi, has been charged with professional misconduct and the District Judge of West Tanjore has submitted to this Court his report on the inquiry. The charge against the respondent was that he wrote to one Ramachandra Ayyar, a vakil's clerk at Tanjore, to obtain surreptitiously a copy of the judgment in S. C. S. No. 541 of 1925 on the file of the District Munsif's Court, Mannargudi, by offering some inducement or bribe to the record clerk of the District Court. The learned District Judge has held the charge to be proved, but in the circumstances of the case has suggested that a suspension for a period of 2 or 3 months or a severe warning would meet the case. The letter on which the complaint was based reads as follows :

Plaintiff's witnesses, K. Sambasiva Ayyar (Ettakkudi Sambu). In the judgment of the above suit, it has been said that Sambu has given false evidence and that he is not honest. So the judgment in the said S. C. No. 541 of 1925 is necessarily required. Sambu has been committed to the Court of Session, Tanjore. The case is posted for hearing on 31st August 1936 in the Court of the Assistant Sessions Judge. Can we get the above judgment? Give something to the record clerk and ascertain. If you write to me that the above judgment can be got, I shall at once send there Sakti Ammal with money for expenses. Please write a reply to me regarding the above judgment before the coming Tuesday or Wednesday. Let no one know that I have written this letter. Please at once make enquiries in Court and write a reply to me.

We are unable to read this letter as meaning that the respondent was intending to obtain a copy of the judgment referred to surreptitiously. But it certainly does contain instructions to a vakil's clerk to give to the record clerk a bribe for supplying information with regard to the record. For a member of the Bar to suggest that an official or anyone should be bribed amounts to professional misconduct, and professional misconduct of grave nature. The fact that bribes of this nature have been given by others is no excuse. In this case the learned District Judge has suggested that a lenient view should be taken because the respondent has been a member of the legal profession for 25 years and has hitherto held an unblemished record. We will accept this recommendation of the learned District Judge and in view of the past record of the respondent we will not impose the penalty which the offence deserves. We consider that in this case a suspension from practice from now until the end of January 1938 will be sufficient, and the respondent will be suspended for this period. But we wish it to be clearly understood that we regard offences of this nature as being grave offences and in future the punishment will be made to fit the offence. I will add that the fact that proceedings of this nature are instituted as the result of a grudge—as appears to be the case here — makes no difference to the gravity of the offence and cannot be pleaded in excuse.

Second Appeal No. 306 of 1933, Decided on 26th July 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Ramnad at Madura, in A. S. No. 101 of 1932.

(a) Guardian and Ward—Debts contracted by guardian — Testamentary guardian of minor incurring debt on behalf of minor in course of business started by father — Guardian is personally liable—Creditor is also entitled to have decree against assets of business on showing that guardian has right of indemnity in respect of such assets.

Where a guardian of the minor constituted under the will of the father continues the business started by the father properly as per directions in the will and incurs debt on behalf of the minor in the course of carrying on such business, the creditor is entitled to have recourse against the assets of the business in addition to proceeding against the guardian personally. But before the creditor can get a decree directly against the assets it must be shown that the guardian has a right of indemnity in respect of such assets and the principle upon which the creditor is given a decree against the estate is by working out the principle of subrogation by which the creditor is allowed to stand in the shoes of the guardian.

But even this right of indemnity of the guardian will again be dependent upon the fact that on the taking of accounts of the transactions during the period of his guardianship there is nothing due and owing by him to the estate in respect of any of his transactions : 35 Cal 320 Rel. on. [P 266 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 6, R. 17 - Suit against two defendants alleging them to be partners in business—Amendment of plaint on basis that defendant 1 is carrying on business as guardian of defendant 2—Amendment can be allowed if it is in accordance with facts set out in plaint.

In the interests of justice even where a question of limitation might arise a Court can allow the amendment. [P 267 C 1]

Where a suit was instituted against two defendants alleging that they were partners in the business and all the necessary facts and circumstances under which the suit debt was incurred were clearly set out in the plaint and the amendment as sought and allowed by the lower Court was in accordance with the true facts that defendant 1 carried on the trade as guardian of defendant 2 in pursuance of a direction in the will of the father :

B. Sitarama Rao — for Appellant.

T. M. Krishnaswami Iyer and N. Sivaramakrishna Iyer — for Respondent.

Judgment.—This second appeal arises out of a suit upon a promissory note executed in favour of one Nagaswami Ayyar, the assignor of the plaintiff by A. T. R. S. Paramasivam Chetti. It is found on the evidence that A. T. R. S. is the vilasam of a firm carried on on behalf of defendant 2 Ramasubramania Chettiar. The father of Ramasubramania Chettiar was carrying on this business and before his death he left a will dated 30th October 1920 in and by which he appointed Paramasivam Chettiar as the guardian of his minor son Ramasubramania Chettiar and directed him to continue the business and conduct it so as not to cause loss to the minor. In pursuance of the same, the said business was conducted in the name and vilasam of the A. T. R. S. The debt sued on was admittedly incurred in the course of the said business and the binding character of the debt was not disputed by defendant 2 at the hearing of the appeal before the lower Court. The first Court exonerated defendant 1 and gave a decree against defendant 2 against the joint family properties. This decree is obviously unsustainable because it would not be open to the father of defendant 2 to appoint a testamentary guardian in respect of the joint family properties and it would not be open to such a guardian to deal with the joint family properties which had devolved upon the minor by right of survivorship. It is open to a father to appoint a testamentary guardian in respect of the self-acquired properties which a minor may inherit. There is no evidence before me that the trade which was being carried on by the father during his lifetime and continued after his death was not the acquisition of the father. It must therefore be taken that Paramasivam Chetti carried on the business properly in pursuance of the direction under the will. If a debt was incurred by him during the course of the business, he would be personally liable but a creditor is entitled to have direct recourse against the assets of the business. But before he can get such a decree, it must be shown that the guardian has a right of indemnity in respect of such assets and the principle upon which the creditor is given a decree against the estate is by working out the principle of subrogation by which the creditor is allowed to stand in the shoes of the guardian. As pointed out by Mukerjee J. in 35 Cal 320[1] at p. 327, it would have to be proved that the guardian is entitled to indemnity against the estate of the infant for the whole of his transactions during his guardianship. No doubt, having regard to the admission of defendant 2 in this case that the debt is a binding one, the guardian will prima facie be entitled to the right of reimbursement. But the right of reimbursement will again be dependent upon the fact that on a taking of account of the transactions during the period of his guardianship, there is nothing due and owing by him to the estate in respect of any of his transactions. Unfortunately by not understanding the correct position of the law, defendant 1 was exonerated from the suit and a decree was passed by the first Court against defendant 2's joint family assets and in the appeal preferred therefrom by defendant 2, defendant 1 was not made a party to the appeal and even in the second appeal before me, the appellant has not chosen to make defendant 1 a party to the appeal. But that would not preclude me from giving a decree directly against the assets if, as I have stated, it has been proved that defendant 1 was entitled to indemnity against the estate on an account being taken. Unfortunately no materials have been placed in this case and I am not in a position to give that decree in the state of the evidence on record.

1. Bhawal Sahu v. Baijnath Pertab Narayan Singh, (1908) 35 Cal 320=12 C W N 256.

There is another point which was decided against the appellant in this case namely that the learned District Munsif allowed an amendment in the case which, it is contended, he ought not to have done. The nature of the amendment is this. The suit was filed against both defendants 1 and 2 originally on the footing that defendants 1 and 2 were partners in the said business but all the necessary facts and the circumstances under which the promissory note was executed and the debt was incurred were clearly set out in the plaint and the amendment sought was in consonance with the true view of facts that defendant 1 carried on the trade in pursuance of the direction under the will of the father of defendant 2. I think the amendment has been properly allowed. In the interests of justice even where a question of limitation might arise a Court can allow the amendment: vide 48 Cal 110.[2] In the result the second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

BEASLEY C. J.

P. S. Ramaswami Iyer and another — Petitioners.

v.

Al. Sp. Pl. Subramanian Chettiar, Agent, Lakshmanan Chettiar, Banker — Respondent.

Civil Revn. Petns. Nos. 1702 and 1703 of 1935, Decided on 17th February 1937, from orders of Dist. Court, Coimbatore, D/- 27th July 1935.

(a) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 25 (1) — Dismissal of petition on statement by creditor that debt had been paid is one under S. 25 (1).

Where an insolvency petition is dismissed by the Court upon the statement by the creditor that his debt had been paid and that the petition should be dismissed, such dismissal is one under S. 25 (1) of the Act as it comes within the words "for any other sufficient cause" of that section. [P 268 C 2]

(b) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 26— Applicability—Whether petition was frivolous or vexatious need not be decided at the time of its dismissal under S. 25 (1)—Court can do so on separate application.

For the application of the provisions of S. 26 of the Act it is not necessary that at the time of dismissal under S. 25 (1) itself the Court should be satisfied that the petition was frivolous or vexatious. The Court can consider the matter on a separate application even though it did not do so at the time of the dismissal of the petition under S. 25 (1). [P 268 C 2]

(c) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 26— 'Debtor' need not in reality be debtor — Application by creditor against him makes him debtor.

The word "debtor" in S. 26 of the Act means any one against whom an insolvency application has been presented by a creditor. The person applying for compensation under that section need not in truth be a debtor at all. [P 268 C 2]

(d) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 26— Debt by Hindu father binding on family— Demand by creditor — Alienation of large portion of family property by father together with sons after demand—Petition in insolvency by creditor against father and sons— Debt paid and petition dismissed under S. 25 (1) — Petition against sons held not frivolous and vexatious and no compensation could be recovered by them.

A creditor in whose favour a Hindu father had executed a promissory note found to be binding on the family presented a petition in insolvency against the father and his two sons to have them declared insolvents. About 4 months later, on the creditor's statement that his claim was satisfied, the insolvency petition was dismissed under S. 25 (1). The sons claimed compensation under S. 26 of the Act. It was found on evidence that the debt was one binding on the family for which the son's share could be made liable and that within ten days immediately after a notice demanding payment of the debt was made by the creditor the sons together with their father had set about alienating a large portion of the family properties and that they had no ready money to pay the debt:

Held that under the circumstances the creditor had sufficient grounds to reasonably suppose that fraud was being attempted by the sons also and therefore it could not be held that the petition of the creditor against the sons was frivolous or vexatious and that therefore no compensation was recoverable: Case law referred. [P 270 C 2]

N. Sivaramakrishna Iyer — for Petitioners.

P. S. Sarangapani Iyer — for Respondent.

Order.—The respondent presented a petition in insolvency against a Hindu father and his two sons to have them declared insolvents. The two sons are the petitioners. Their father executed a promissory note in favour of the respondent for Rs. 1500 on 6th June 1931. On 4th March 1932 the respondent made a demand upon the father for payment of the promissory note debt. Between that date and 14th March 1932, there were a series of alienations of joint family property, the petitioners with their father being parties to these alienations. On 27th June 1932 the respondent presented the insolvency petition already referred to on the ground that the father in his capacity as family manager has executed the promissory note in question and alleging that the debt was binding on all the members of the family and that the debt had not been discharged in spite of repeated demands. He alleged that the three respondents to the insolvency petition had brought about a number of sales in favour of their relations, friends and others quoting fictitious debts. This petition was returned on the ground inter alia that the creditor must state how respondents 2 and 3 to the petition were liable to be adjudged insolvents. It was represented with the following endorsement :

> Respondent 1 is the family manager. Respondents 2 and 3 are liable for the debt and they have joined respondent 1 in fraudulently dealing with the property. They are therefore liable to be adjudged.

On 30th November 1932 the creditor filed a statement to the effect that his claim was satisfied and that the insolvency petition might therefore be dismissed. On 1st December 1932 the petitioners put in an application for compensation under S. 26, Provincial Insolvency Act, and the Additional Subordinate Judge on 2nd December 1932 passed the following order on the insolvency petition :

> Petitioner's vakil files memo that claim is satisfied and that the petition may be dismissed. Respondents press for costs. So the point whether this petition was filed on sufficient grounds has to be gone into. Respondents 2 and 3 have filed a petition for compensation. For enquiry, 20th January 1933.

On the application for compensation the following order was made : "Counter in a week. Enquiry 20th January 1933." Later, the matter came up before Mr. Narayana Menon, the then Additional Subordinate Judge, whose predecessor had passed the orders to which I have referred. As regards the father, he passed the following order :

> Respondent 1 admittedly owed the money to the petitioner when the insolvency petition was filed. He had also admittedly alienated a major extent of his properties. Respondent 1 did not pay the petitioner's debt for nearly four months after the alienation. The petitioner had therefore some justifiable apprehension that the alienation was intended to defeat him. Respondent 1 paid the debt due to petitioner after filing of the insolvency petition. In these circumstances I order respondent 1 to bear his costs.

With regard to the petitioners he held that on the face of the insolvency petition they were not necessary parties and could not be adjudged insolvents as they were not personally liable and he ordered the creditor to pay their costs. It is clear that the creditor's statement where he says that the debt had been settled by payment asks for a dismissal of the petition. I think that it must be taken that the petition was dismissed under S. 25, Provincial Insolvency Act and it is not suggested by Mr. K. S. Jayarama Iyer for the respondent that it could be dismissed under any other section though he contends that it was merely withdrawn and not dismissed. With this contention I do not agree as in my view this comes within the words of the section "or that for any other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the Court shall dismiss the petition." The petition having been dismissed under S. 25 (1), the debtor is entitled to apply for compensation under S. 26 (1) but Mr. Jayarama Iyer argues that the provisions of S. 26 can only be applied if at the time of dismissal under S. 25 (1) the Court is satisfied that the petition was frivolous or vexatious and that it does not have in view a subsequent enquiry into that matter. No such restriction, in my view, is to be gathered from the words of the section. The Court can, in my opinion, consider the matter on this application even though it has not done so at the time of the dismissal of the petition under S. 25 (1). Next Mr. Jayarama Iyer contends that the petitioners were not entitled to apply under that section, because they were not "debtors." This argument is founded on the petitioners' own case that they were not personally liable for the debt, it having been contracted by their father. I think this contention is unsound and that 'debtor' in the section means any one against whom an insolvency petition has been presented by a creditor and that the person applying for compensation need not in truth have been a debtor at all. Suppose, for example, that some one wishing to harass another files an insolvency petition against that other person falsely alleging that he is indebted to him and his petition is on that ground dismissed, why should not the alleged debtor be entitled to have compensation awarded to him under S. 26 (1) instead of being driven to the expense of a suit ? In my opinion, the petitioners were 'debtors' within the meaning of the section. The applications were considered by the learned Subordinate Judge who held that the petition was not dismissed under S. 25 (1) and therefore the applications under S. 26 (1) could not be entertained and that it was not open to the Insolvency Court to enquire into the matter further. For the reasons I have already given the opinion of the learned Subordinate Judge was wrong. On appeal, the learned District Judge held that the applications were rightly dismissed, the Court having in his opinion rightly exercised its discretion, to refuse to award compensation. He also agrees with the Subordinate Judge that S. 26 is intended to meet cases where a creditor's application has not only been dismissed on the merits after taking evidence but also held to be frivolous or vexatious, i. e. the present petition was not dismissed under S. 25 (1). My view upon the law which is contrary to that of both the lower Courts does not however dispose of these petitions as, in my opinion, the applications for compensation stood to be dismissed upon the facts already on the record. In para. 13 of his order the learned Subordinate Judge says :

> It is not necessary to state anything further on these petitions but this : I am in no way persuaded, having regard to the records before me and the allegations of the petitioners that the petition filed by the creditor was not justified and that it was fraudulent or frivolous. As it is, we have the fact that in June 1932 the creditor filed the insolvency petition consequent on the fact that there were four alienations by the father and the sons. His claim was satisfied only in November. . . . .

The learned Subordinate Judge who originally dealt with the matter as regards the father as I have already observed stated that the petitioner had some justifiable apprehension, that the alienation was intended to defeat him and he therefore ordered him to bear his own costs. That order does not reflect upon the conduct of the petitioners at all but the learned District Judge in his judgment says :

> A brahmin father and his two sons, one a doctor and the other a lawyer, were heavily involved in debt. The father was personally liable but the family being joint, the sons' shares were also liable. The creditors of the family insisted on the appointment of a trustee to make a rateable distribution of the family assets or that the family should sell its lands etc., in parcels to each creditor according to the amount of his debt. In other words, there was to be a voluntary liquidation.

I doubt very much whether the creditors of the family did insist on the appointment of a trustee. It is merely so alleged in the counter petitions. What the father stated in his statement was that various creditors were pressing for payment of their dues, that he had no ready money on hand, that therefore with a view to pay off all the creditors fully he entered into an arrangement with the creditors with their full consent and co-operation and with the help of respectable mediators, that it was decided under the arrangement that each of the creditors should take a sale of a portion of the family properties equal in value to the debt due to him, that accordingly on 14th March 1932 sale deeds were executed to the creditors in full discharge of their settled debts and that it was clearly recited that a portion of the properties had been reserved for the petitioner in discharge in full of his debt and that the property so reserved was sufficient to the petitioner's knowledge to fully discharge his debt. I must mention here that the creditor in his petition alleged that the property was worthless or inadequate. The father further alleged that the creditor had been throughout made aware of the arrangements and never objected at any time thereto, that he and his sons believed that he would also give effect to it and that they were always ready and willing to execute a sale deed of the property reserved to him. The petitioners filed a joint counter-petition in which they denied that they were heavily involved. Their counter-petition follows closely on the lines of their father's. The creditor in answer to the petitioner's application for compensation denied that he knew or acquiesced in the alleged agreement with the creditors and said that he was never at any time told by anybody about the mediation, which took place behind his back; and the learned counsel for the petitioners was unable to contend before me that any notice of the alleged meeting of the creditors and mediation was ever given to the creditor and I can see no reason for believing that he ever knew of it or afterwards acquiesced in it. The fact that he filed a petition in insolvency indicates the contrary. This alleged arrangement with the creditors was all effected within the space of ten days immediately following on the notice of demand for payment given by the creditor. Certainly on the record before the Court, it is very probable that the whole thing was done behind creditor's back. On the record it seems to me that the Insolvency Court could not find that the petition against the two sons was not put in without some reason. The legal position with regard to the liability of sons in a Hindu undivided family in respect of a binding family debt incurred by their father to be adjudicated insolvents is even today none too clear though in 61 M L J 518,[1] Krishnan Pandalai J. held that the son of a Hindu father who died after incurring debts upon promissory notes apart from some special circumstances which would make him personally liable for the family debt cannot be adjudged insolvent on account of his liability as a member of the family to pay those debts out of the family properties. In the course of his judgment he refers to an unreported decision in C. M. A. No. 47 of 1916 where it was held that members of joint families liable as such for a family debt but not otherwise are debtors within the meaning of the Insolvency Act and therefore can be adjudged insolvent on those debts. He does not follow that case and refers also to 49 Mad 217,[2] which to some extent followed the unreported decision though the Judges there say that each case would depend upon its circumstances and that, if the petitioner makes the necessary allegations and proves them, then the Court would be justified in adjudging the members of a joint family insolvents. He also refers to 50 Mad 981.[3] In that case it was held by Odgers and Venkatasubba Rao JJ. that a decree against a son for the debt of his deceased father to the extent of the assets in his hands does not make him (the son) liable to adjudication and he cannot be so adjudicated unless the decree is a personal decree. The conditions necessary to impose a personal liability upon the members of an undivided family in respect of money borrowed for family purposes are stated in 22 Mad 166[4] at pp. 167 and 168. In 44 Mad 810[5] Sadasiva Ayyar and Napier JJ. held that the members of a joint Hindu family can be adjudicated insolvents on a single petition by a creditor if they are liable on a joint debt and have been guilty of a joint act or acts of insolvency. Although this case was relied upon by Mr. Jayarama Ayyar, I do not think that it is of much assistance. This matter has also been dealt with by Cornish J. in A I R 1936 Mad 64[6], where he holds that the members of the family must be under a personal liability before they can be adjudicated. Even assuming that the petitioners would not be personally liable for this debt and that they could not therefore be adjudicated insolvents in respect of it, I am far from thinking that the petitioning creditor must have known that the sons could not be made insolvents. This was a debt binding on the family for which certainly the sons' shares could be made liable and they together with their father set about alienating a large portion of the family property under circumstances which the petitioning creditor might very reasonably suppose indicated that a fraud upon him was being attempted; and clearly the financial position of the family was such that its debts could not be discharged without such alienations. I am satisfied that there was quite sufficient ground on the facts for the lower Courts' refusal to award compensation. Both the Civil Revision Petitions are dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—This second appeal arises out of a suit which relates to a Mantapam on the river bank at Tirukarungudi. It was instituted by the plaintiffs for themselves and as representatives of the Brahmin Vadagalai Sri Vaishnavite community at Tirukarungudi. The ground assigned for the suit was that the temple of Sri Swami Alagia Nambirayar temple represented by the present Dharmakarta, defendant 1, set up title to the property and asserted that no other body or person has got any right or title thereto and that no person can use the said Mantapam without leave or license obtained from defendant 1. The claim asserted on behalf of the plaintiffs was a title to the Mantapam on behalf of the Vadagalai community not merely for the performance of sandhya, japam and other ceremonies but they have the exclusive right and control thereof and no other person can use the Mantapam without their consent.

The finding of the learned Subordinate Judge is that this Mantapam has been constructed out of public subscriptions and has been used and enjoyed by every member of the Brahmin community in the village of Tirukarungudi. His finding in substance is that it is a public endowment dedicated to the use of the entire Brahmin community. He also found that the plaintiffs have failed to establish their exclusive right to the Mantapam either in regard to the title set up by them or in regard to the management thereof. He further found that the temple has not established its exclusive right to the possession of this Mantapam. This was also the view of the learned District Munsif who tried the suit. The learned Subordinate Judge however dismissed the suit on the ground that inasmuch as the suit was filed on behalf of only the Vadagalai community, the plaintiffs cannot be given any relief. It seems to me that this view is wrong. The finding of the learned Subordinate Judge as aforesaid is that every Brahmin in the village is entitled to have the use of the Mantapam for the performance of sandhya, japam, purificatory and other customary ceremonies. This he is entitled to do without obstruction from anybody on behalf of the temple or on the part of anybody. The Brahmins in the said village comprise not only Vadagalais but also Smarthas, Thengalai Vaishnavites and Brahmins of other persuasion. The terms "'Vadagalai", "Tengalai", or "Smartha" represent particular sects or groups of Brahmins having tenets of their own. Each forms a distinct group by itself. A Brahmin of the Vadagalai sect as a Brahmin will be entitled to use this Mantapam for performance of the said sandhya, etc. If anybody offers obstruction to the said use or asserts any title or right hostile thereto, he is entitled to have his right vindicated in a Court of law. So it is open to the plaintiffs to institute a suit not only on behalf of themselves but on behalf of the Vadagalai sect which in that village comprises not less than 100 households — to institute a representative suit for getting a declaration that not only the plaintiffs but also every member of the Vadagalai community is entitled to the use of the said Mantapam for performance of the said sandhya, japam, etc. There can be no doubt that all the members of the Vadagalai community in regard to this relief have got a common interest and a common grievance against defendant 1 in so far as their rights are denied. No doubt, the Vadagalai community claimed also in addition to this right, a right to the exclusive title and ownership of the Mantapam. The fact that this title was denied and negatived would not preclude the Court from granting the relief which they are entitled to get as members of the Vadagalai community for the use of the Mantapam for the said purposes.

After hearing the learned counsel on both sides and discussing the matter over with them, the proper order, I think, that should be passed in this case, will be to declare the rights of all the parties and prevent a litigation as far as possible. I therefore propose having this object in view to make the following declarations viz.: (1) that defendant 1, temple, has no title or possession of the suit Mantapam, (2) that as members of the Brahmin community, the plaintiffs and other Vada-galai Brahmins whom they represent are entitled to use the said Mantapam for performing sandhya, japam, purificatory and other customary ceremonies without any obstruction from defendants, and (3) that the Vadagalai community is not entitled to the exclusive right of the suit Mantapam nor are they entitled to any right of management as set up in the plaint. I direct each party to bear his own costs of this litigation throughout.

Kilachari Agricultural Co-operative Bank — Defendant.

C. S. No. 210 of 1935, Decided on 5th October 1937.

Banker and Customer—Secretary of bank having authority to receive deposits receiving them at depositor's house—Deposits ratified by bank — Certain deposit misappropriated by secretary — Bank is liable to depositor.

Every act done by an agent in the course of his employment on behalf of his principal and within the apparent scope of his authority binds the principal unless the agent is in fact unauthorized to do that particular act and the person with whom he is dealing is aware that the agent in doing as he does is exceeding the authority given by the principal. [P 273 C 2]

A secretary and the treasurer of a bank had the authority to receive deposits. He accepted the deposits at the depositor's house and gave him receipts different from the counterfoil. The bank ratified these deposits by paying interest on them and repaying the capital from time to time. One of the deposits was misappropriated by the secretary and the depositor sued the bank for the amount :

Held that the case was a fortiorari one of an agent's apparent authority and also of express authority to act in the way which he did. The bank was therefore liable and the fact that the secretary had no authority to issue a receipt different from the counterfoil was no answer to the claim of the depositor : (1854) 10 Ex 10 and (1912) A C 716, Rel. on. [P 274 C 2; P 275 C 1, 2]

Judgment —This is a suit in which the plaintiffs are suing the defendants for a sum of Rs. 5300 together with interest which it is alleged was deposited by the plaintiffs or by those in whose shoes the plaintiffs now stand with the defendant Bank upon fixed deposit for a specified period and at the end of that period the money was not returned to the plaintiffs. In the written statement in addition to formal matters such as not admitting the allegations it is alleged that the one who received the actual deposit was not authorized by the defendants so to do and was acting outside his authority when he accepted the deposit from the plaintiffs, that under the rules and bye-laws of the defendant Bank the panchayatdars have a discretion to accept or not to accept a deposit of every description before the Bank is bound by the deposit and that the mere receipt by the person who in fact received this money, viz. the secretary, would not constitute a valid deposit and that the panchayatdars did not indicate their acceptance of the deposit. In other words it is alleged in the written statement that the secretary of the defendants was acting outside the scope of his apparent and obvious authority to the knowledge of the defendants when the money deposited was paid and further that the Bank have not under its rules and bye-laws accepted responsibility for this deposit to the knowledge of the defendants. On behalf of the defendants no evidence has been called and at the close of the plaintiff's case I was asked to adjourn the further trial for the defendants to be able at a future date to call evidence in support of their case. I refused the application firstly because this case has been notified for some two or three weeks as being in the list for trial and parties should be ready for trial. If of course a witness is ill or is unable to be here naturally one adjourns a case to enable the evidence of that witness to be called. Secondly the application, made when it was, in my view, had no support or justification for the grant of an adjournment.

The facts are as follows : The Catholic Indian Association of Southern India had funds at their disposal which apparently they desired to invest upon fixed deposits at profitable rates of interest. At all relevant times Mr. Thambi Pillai was the Honorary Secretary of this Association, and it was he who in fact made the deposit, the subject matter of this suit, as well as other deposits. In all seven deposits were made by the Association through the gentleman I have mentioned and the method in which they were made was this with the exception of the first one or two. The defendant Bank has its premises at Kilacheri and again at material times the secretary and treasurer was Mr. M. Papayya Naidu. That gentleman was frequently in Madras and when the Catholic Association desired to make a deposit upon fixed deposit with the defendant Bank, the secretary and treasurer of the Bank would call upon Mr. Thambi Pillai. Money would then be handed over in cash to the Bank's secretary and treasurer, and he would in return hand over to the Association's representative a fixed deposit receipt. That fixed deposit receipt obviously comes from a book which is Ex. B.1, and Mr. Thambi Pillai, P. W. 1, said in his evidence which I accept, that so far as his recollection goes, the receipt was always a loose receipt. On this particular occasion, viz. 3rd October 1929, Rs. 5300 was handed over at the request of the Bank's treasurer and secretary, a clerk at the Catholic Association's office filled up the blanks, it was signed by the Bank's treasurer and given in exchange. That was the procedure in certainly five of the seven deposits. In the first two, the deposits were in fact made at Kilacheri by the local Catholic priest who was requested so to do by the authorities in Madras. In respect of all these deposits, interest has been paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs as and when it became due, perhaps a little time following the due date. In respect of all the deposits except the last one, the one concerning this suit, the principal monies have been repaid by the defendants to the plaintiffs, and nothing arises in regard to those six earlier transactions. With regard to the last one Rev. Mora who is the Vicar General to the Archbishop of Madras, who is P. W. 2, has been called, and whose evidence I accept entirely, and he says that in the course of his duties he received interest in respect of the fixed deposit which is the subject matter of this suit and he entered in his books at the time of receipt a record of payment of the interest, and interest was payable in the months of October in the years 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933, since the fixed deposit was for a term of five years from October 1929 and would be repayable in October 1934, and that interest was paid in cash by the secretary and treasurer of the defendant Bank at the Vicar General's office. Father Mora also says that he received interest upon all the other deposits, six in number, made in the way I have already mentioned, in the same manner, viz. by the secretary and treasurer coming to his office, paying in cash amounts from time to time due in respect of interest on those deposits and that he recorded in his books similarly as he did with this one, receipts of interest. In addition to the deposits which I have already mentioned and made by the plaintiffs or as I said those in whose shoes the plaintiffs stand, the defendants have received other deposits, and they have received them in exactly the same way, viz. their secretary and treasurer, the same man M. Papayya Naidu, going to the houses or offices of the potential depositors, receiving the amount of the deposit, mostly in cash and sometimes by cheque, giving a deposit receipt either loose already filled in or filled in at the house of the depositor, sometimes torn from the counterfoil book, and I think on one occasion a mere acknowledgment was given of the receipt of the money paid and the fixed deposit receipt was sent a day or two later to the depositor from the Bank's premises at Kilacheri. Witnesses P. Ws. 3, 4 and 5 speak to these other deposits which are entirely unconnected with those made by the plaintiffs. Those other deposits mentioned by the three witnesses above have been repaid by the defendant Bank except in regard to one of which there is no evidence that it has been repaid nor is there any suggestion put to the witnesses who spoke about it that the defendants repudiated it on the ground that M. Papayya Naidu had no authority from them when he accepted those deposits.

To this evidence, there is none called in rebuttal or in denial by or on behalf of the defendants. When the learned counsel cross-examined the plaintiffs' witnesses, he never suggested that anything they had said was inaccurate at all. Some of them were asked whether they had read the bye-laws of the defendant bank, and they all denied having read them except P. W. 5, Father Soma, who said that after he had made a deposit he subsequently became a member of the bank and then he did read the bye-laws, but then he was never asked to identify them or to deal with them. He was asked to give what they contained, but I pointed out to the learned counsel, that if they were written, they would speak for themselves when they were proved in evidence, but no copy was ever put to the witness for him to identify it. It is not contended by the defendants that the man who carried out all these transactions, M. Papayya Naidu, was not their secretary and treasurer nor that he was unauthorized to receive deposits. Undoubtedly, he was the secretary and treasurer and he had authority to receive deposits. It is alleged in the written statement that there was a limitation upon his authority to the extent that he could receive these deposits only at the business premises of the defendant bank and not outside. Firstly, there is no evidence before me that there was any such limitation upon his authority. Secondly, if there was such limitation, then it would be incumbent upon the defendant bank to prove that such limitation was brought to the knowledge of Mr. Thambi Pillai at the time or before he effected the deposit of Rs. 5300, the subject matter of this suit, so that when he paid to the bank's secretary and treasurer that money, he would know that it was being received without any authority from his principal so to receive it in the way it was then being paid to him. As I said, it is not contended that the secretary and treasurer had no authority to receive money and to receive fixed deposit and that he was not their agent so to do and it was not in the course of his employment so to act. Every act done by an agent in the course of his employment on behalf of his principal and within the apparent scope of his authority binds the principal, unless the agent is in fact unauthorized to do that particular act and the person with whom he is dealing is aware that the agent in doing as he does is exceeding the authority given by the principal. This man had authority to receive deposits. Before the one, the subject matter of this suit, evidenced by Ex. A.1, was effected, there were certainly four other deposits made by Mr. Thambi Pillai in the same way as this one was made, viz. either at the house or the office of that gentleman in Madras.

In respect of those four deposits, I say, four, because of the total of seven, two of them were effected at Kilacheri, the defendants had paid before the date of this deposit and have paid since the date of this deposit interest upon those earlier deposits, and they have also at the date or some time thereafter of maturity and the expiration of the period mentioned in the fixed deposit repaid the principal. Therefore upon the evidence before me, not only was there authority which one can describe as apparent, but there was, by the conduct of the defendants in ratifying the deposits accepted by the secretary and treasurer by paying interest and repaying the capital, express notice to Mr. Thambi Pillai. Whilst the principal moneys deposited were not repaid until a year or two after the deposit in question was made, and the re-payment of the principal would not of course be express notice to Mr. Thambi Pillai, but the payment of interest however was so, and the subsequent re-payment of the principal by these defendants shows to me that they expressly authorized their secretary and treasurer to receive deposits in this way. Ex. A-3 a letter from the defendants to the plaintiffs dated 2nd April 1930, signed by the gentleman, who received the deposits but written from the office of the company, deals with all the deposits which have been made up to that time, and it was apparent then that there were negotiations between the parties regarding an earlier repayment than the time fixed. There was no suggestion that that letter was written by the secretary of defendant bank without authority nor that the panchayatdar or those who would be in authority over this man had not the facilities for seeing the correspondence and copies which would be kept in the ordinary way. The question of the responsibility for the return of this fixed deposit arises after 3rd October 1934. In Ex. A.4, dated 12th October 1934, written by the plaintiffs to the defendants, the deposit receipt, Ex. A.1, was sent' and request made for a fresh deposit receipt to be issued. It was contemplated then that the plaintiffs should continue these deposits.

There was no reply from the defendants, but they wrote Ex. A.5 to the Deputy Registrar of Co-operative Societies on 15th October 1934. In that letter, they informed the Deputy Registrar that whilst the deposit receipt records the payment of Rs. 5300 the counterfoil in the book retained among the banks books there is entered a deposit of Rs. 100 in the name of M. Papayya Naidu, the bank's secretary and treasurer, and that no details were found in their accounts regarding this transaction. Then they ask in what way a reply should be made. The matter apparently was one which was the subject of enquiry or decision by the Registrar of Co-operative Societies. I am not concerned in any way with the result of his decision, whatever it may be. But, from that time, although several letters were written to the defendants by the plaintiffs and by their learned counsel, no real reply was received and never was it suggested to the plaintiffs that when their secretary and treasurer accepted from the plaintiffs this deposit he was acting outside the authority which he had received from the defendants. That allegation appeared for the first time in the written statement in October 1935. Although many defences are raised in the written statement, learned counsel for the defendants told me today that he relies only upon two, and these are as follows : (1) The secretary was not acting within the scope of his authority in issuing a receipt different from the counterfoil ; in other words, in entering apparently the entry of Rs. 100 as received in the counterfoil of A.1 and Rs. 5300 in A.1 itself, he was acting outside the scope of his authority ; (2) that as the defendants are incorporated under the Co-operative Societies Act, they are a Bank and therefore as a Bank, every transaction which they carry out must be carried out by them at their business premises. So far as the first contention goes, I have no evidence as to the scope of this man's authority except that he was appointed and at all material times acted as the secretary and treasurer. He received the deposits in the ways I have mentioned, which deposits were honoured by the defendants by payment of interest and subsequent payment of principal. It may be and probably is true that he had no authority to make different entries in any way upon receipts and upon their counterfoils, but if it is so, that can be no answer to the claims of the plaintiffs. I have dealt earlier with the responsibility of a principal in regard to the acts of the agent. To my mind, this case is an a fortiori one of an agent's apparent authority and also of express authority to act in the way in which he did. So far as the second defence raised is concerned, I was referred to the case in (1854) 10 Ex. 10,[1] in support of the contention made. That case lends not the slightest support to the second defence which is relied upon today and it is abundant authority that the claim of the plaintiffs should succeed. That was a case where a woman paid to the manager of a Bank moneys to be invested upon mortgage security. The Bank manager misappropriated the money, and his principals, the bank, were held responsible. (1912) A C 716[2] was a case in which the managing clerk of a firm of solicitors in England defrauded a lady of property and moneys, and in carrying out the fraud he used his principal's office. The lady concerned believed, as in fact the case was, that the clerk was the principal's clerk, and she also believed that in executing the documents she executed and in following the advice which he gave he was acting for and on behalf of his principals, when he had himself appropriated the proceeds from the property. His principals, although personally entirely innocent, were held responsible for his frauds. I wish to refer only to the words of Willes J., which were cited with approval by Lord Macnaughten in the last named case in which Willes J. said (p. 733) :

> In all these cases it may be said, as it was said here, that the master had not authorized the act. It is true, he has not authorized the particular act, but he has put the agent in his place to do that class of acts, and he must be answerable for the manner in which that agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of his master to place him in.

I merely refer to this in dealing with the question of the responsibility of the present defendants in regard to the moneys received by their secretary and treasurer. It may well be that the secretary and treasurer put that money into his pocket—and from the deposit receipt Ex. A.1 and the counterfoil of that deposit receipt Ex. B.1, the difference between the two amounts would indicate that that is the case—but that does not in any way excuse the defendants being responsible. In my view, as I said earlier, this is an a fortiori case of the responsibility of the principals for the acts of their agents. The result is that this suit succeeds, and there will be a judgment and a decree in favour of the plaintiffs for a sum of Rs. 5856 being the amount of principal and interest up to the date of suit, and for interest at the rate of 6¼ per cent.

from the date of the institution of the suit up to this day ; the amount of all interest and principal together with all costs, which I award to the plaintiffs, will carry interest at the rate of 6 per cent. Certified for two counsels.

(a) Legal Practitioner's Act (1879), S. 13 — Misconduct — A obtaining decree against B for account — B obtaining decree against A for maintenance — C pleader acting for B in maintenance suit — Later on C appearing for A in execution of A's decree against B — C held not guilty of misconduct.

A obtained a decree against B in a suit for accounts. B obtained a decree against A for maintenance. C who was a pleader for B acted for B in that suit. Later on C appeared for A in execution of A's decree against B. Question was if C was guilty of professional misconduct.

Held suit by A against B had nothing to do with suit by B against A, and although it might have been more in keeping with the traditions of the profession, if C had not acted for A, yet C could not be said to have acted unprofessionally. [P 277 C 1]

(b) Legal Practitioner's Act (1879), S. 13 — Misconduct — Purchasing and fraudulently executing decree of client for larger sum amounts to misconduct.

Where a pleader in contravention of R. 16 of the Rules framed under the Legal Practitioners Act purchases a decree obtained by his client, he commits professional misconduct, and more so when he fraudulently tries to execute it for a larger amount than what is actually due. [P 278 C 1]

Leach C. J. — We are called upon to consider the report of the District Judge of Vizagapatam on charges of professional misconduct made against Mr. L, a pleader practising in the District Munsif's Court at Rajam. The petitioner is the son of one Mantripragada Kondamma, and in O. S. No. 657 of 1919 of the Court of the District Munsif of Rajam he sued his mother for an account of the management of his estate during his minority, and on 15th December 1920 obtained a money decree against her. In O. S. No. 834 of 1924 of the same Court the mother sued the son for the recovery of maintenance due to her and for future maintenance. The suit was decreed, but the petitioner appealed first to the District Court and then to the High Court. The appeals were dismissed. Kondamma had sued in forma pauperis and in dismissing the second appeal this Court directed that half the court-fee should be paid by her and half by her son.

The petitioner paid his half of the court-fee, but his mother failed to pay her half and Government attached the decree which she had obtained against her son. The respondent acted for the mother in the suit against the son and was in fact her legal adviser during the years 1924-25. In 1925 he agreed to act for the son, and on 14th December 1932 he filed an application in execution proceedings arising out of the decree obtained by the son against the mother in O. S. No. 657 of 1919. This application was filed the day before the 12 years period of limitation expired.

The fact that the respondent was acting for the son against the mother did not prevent him from acting for the mother against the son in matters connected with her suit for maintenance. On 18th January 1935 he filed in O. S. No. 834 of 1924 a memorandum which purported to show what payments had been made by the son towards the decree obtained by the mother. The payments mentioned in the memorandum were Rs. 375-5-0 on 28th June 1928, Rs. 83-12-0 on 20th March 1928, Rupees 469-13-6 on 21st December 1932 and Rs. 94-1-2 on 1st November 1933. The memorandum concluded with a statement to the effect that after giving credit for these payments the amount due to the decree-holder, that is to the mother was Rs. 282-9-8. This was not correct because the figure Rs. 469-13-6 against the date 21st December 1932 should have been Rs. 639-2-2. In other words there was an under-statement of the position by Rupees 169-4-8. There was not due by the son the sum of Rs. 282-9-8 but only the sum of Rs. 113-5-0.

On 21st July 1935 the respondent bought the mother's decree against her son. The deed of transfer is Ex. 13. It stated that there was due Rs. 376-10-0 by the son to the mother under her decree and the decree was transferred to the respondent for this amount. Having got the mother's decree transferred to him, the respondent then proceeded to execute it against the son. He attached a house belonging to the son and bought the property in at the Court auction. The sale however was set aside on the son paying into the Court the amount due under the decree. In the execution proceedings the respondent did not make the adjustment in respect of the Rs. 169.4.8 but treated it as being owing by the petitioner which of course was not the case.

As a result of these execution proceedings, the petitioner preferred the complaint in respect of which the charge was framed by the District Munsif of Rajam. There were two charges which may be summarized as follows. (1) The respondent had been guilty of professional misconduct in acting for the petitioner when he had acted for the petitioner's mother against the petitioner. (2) He had with dishonest intent obtained an assignment of the mother's decree and in executing it had suppressed payments made in reduction, thereby committing a breach of trust against the petitioner and a fraud on the Court. The District Munsif held that the charges had not been proved and consequently found for the respondent. The record and the report of the District Munsif were then submitted to the District Judge who made his own report thereon. The District Judge considered that the respondent had been guilty of unprofessional conduct in acting for the son in the circumstances of the case and that he also had been guilty of unprofessional conduct in purchasing the mother's decree and executing it for a sum in excess of what was due. These are the findings which we have to consider.

We consider that the respondent was not guilty of professional misconduct in filing the petition in execution of the petitioner's decree. The petitioner's suit had nothing to do with the mother's suit. It would have shown a spirit more in keeping with the traditions of the profession if the respondent had not acted for the petitioner, but we cannot say that there was anything professionally wrong in so doing. There was no necessity for him to obtain the consent of the petitioner's mother, and there was no likelihood of having to make use of anything obtained by him when acting for the mother.

The second charge however stands on an entirely different footing. R. 16 of the Rules of this Court framed under the Legal Practitioners Act, 1879, states that practitioners of Courts subordinate to the High Court are strictly prohibited from purchasing from their clients or from any other person, any interest in any decree passed by the Court in which they practise. The rules were published on 10th December 1934, but as long ago as 9th June 1870 the High Court had issued a circular to the same effect. S. 136, T. P. Act, prohibits legal practitioners from purchasing or trafficking in any actionable claim and states that no Court of justice shall enforce at the instance of the legal practitioner any such actionable claim. A decree does not come within the category of actionable claims, but the principle involved is the same. The respondent therefore knew or must be deemed to have known that he was acting contrary to the directions of this Court when he purchased the mother's decree against her son. The learned District Judge expresses the opinion that a vakil with sound professional ideas would have revolted instinctively at the idea of taking such a transfer, and I am in agreement with this statement. Not only did the respondent purchase this decree from Kondamma, but he executed it knowing that there was a mistake in the suit register, and that he was not entitled to the sum of Rs. 376.10.0 but that sum less Rs. 169.4.8. That he knew the true position is shown by Ex. B, a letter written on 11th October 1933, at the instance of the respondent to the petitioner. In this letter he specifically refers to the sum of Rupees 639.2.2 which was the amount which should have been recorded on 18th January 1935 instead of the sum of Rupees 469.13.6. In this letter it is stated that "If you pay the said amount (Rs. 123.9.9) accordingly, your decree in full, as well as Rs. 762.11.11 due by you to her up to date, will be satisfied". This shows that he knew the exact position on 11th October 1933 and that the petitioner had only to pay Rs. 123.9.9 to clear off his liability under the mother's decree at that date. That sum of Rs. 123.9.9 was admittedly paid on 30th October 1933.

The respondent has denied the genuineness of Ex. B, and it has been suggested in the course of the arguments that it was forged for the purposes of these proceedings. The respondent denied all knowledge of the documents, but he called his clerk who said that it was in the handwriting of his (the clerk's) son-in-law. The son-in-law was then called and he admitted having written the letter and said that he did so at the instructions of the petitioner. If the petitioner were wishing to forge a letter for the purposes of these proceedings (which would in itself be an extraordinary thing to do) I do not consider that he would cause a letter of the nature of Ex. B to be fabricated; moreover, Ex. B sets out in great detail information which could only have been in the possession of the respondent or of his clerk. The letter is a very lengthy one and was written for the purpose of obtaining payment of fees due by the petitioner to the respondent. It was referred to in the complaint itself and I consider that the suggestion that the petitioner induced the son-in-law of the respondent's clerk to fabricate it is too grotesque for serious consideration. We have no hesitation in regarding Ex. B as a genuine document, which means that the respondent instituted execution proceedings against his own client with full knowledge of the real position and obtained from him a larger sum than was in fact due by him. This in itself amounts to unprofessional conduct. But when it is coupled with the fact that he was executing the decree which he himself had bought in direct contravention of the rules framed by this Court under the Legal Practitioners Act the offence grows in seriousness. The respondent is guilty of grave professional misconduct, and we are unable to accept the recommendation of the District Judge that he should be suspended merely for a period of one month and twenty-two days, the period during which he was actually prevented from practising by the administrative orders of this Court. We consider that the offence is one which should be punished by suspension from practice for a much longer period than this and we direct that the respondent be suspended from practice from now until the end of the next summer vacation of the District Munsif's Court of Rajam.

We also direct that the respondent should pay to the petitioner the sum of Rs. 180, representing the amount of Rs. 169.4.8 which he recovered from the petitioner in excess of the true amount and interest thereon. The respondent's sanad will not in any event be issued to him until he has paid this amount.

K. S. Champakesa Aiyengar for K. S. Krishnaswami Aiyengar (Government-Advocate) — for the Crown.

N. Srinivasa Aiyengar—for Respondent.

Venkatasubba Rao J.—In the appeal that we have just disposed of, a question of court-fee has been raised on behalf of the Government under S. 12 (ii), Court-fees Act. The suit is in effect one for partition and possession, brought by the plaintiff against his cosharers. He claimed in the plaint two separate shares, each of one-eighth, on the ground that he purchased them from two different co-owners. He fixed the total value of the entire one-fourth share at Rs. 14,000 and paid in respect of the relief of "partition and separate possession" of that share, Rs. 100 as court-fee under Sch. 2, Art. 17.B (Madras Amendment) of the Court-fees Act. It must be mentioned that previous to the suit, he had applied to the Collector for separate registration, which was refused. He therefore prayed for a declaration that he was entitled to get himself registered as a landholder to the extent of the one-fourth share. In respect of this relief he paid a court-fee of Rs. 100 under Sch. 2, Art. 17-A (Madras Amendment).

Thus, the plaintiff paid on his plaint in respect of these two reliefs Rs. 200 as the court-fee. Here on the memorandum of appeal also, he paid a similar amount. The appeal, as will be evident from what has been stated in the judgment just delivered, deals with the one-eighth share of defendant 7 alone. The question has been raised whether under the terms of S. 12, the plaintiff can be called on to pay the deficit court-fee payable on his plaint (in the lower Court) in respect of the other one-eighth share. The relevant portion of the sections reads thus :

> Whenever any such suit comes before a Court of appeal, reference or revision, if such Court considers that the said question has been wrongly decided to the detriment of revenue.

There are three possible positions : (i) Notwithstanding that the appeal is confined to a part of the suit, it may be contended that the whole suit has come before the Court of Appeal. Hence the Appellate Court has jurisdiction to levy the deficit court-fee in respect of the entire subject matter of the suit. (ii) That part of the suit alone as is comprised in the appeal (it may be contended) is before the Appellate Court. In that case deficit court-fee only in respect of that part of the suit can be levied. (iii) Only a part of the suit being comprised in the appeal, the suit as such is not before the Appellate Court. Therefore the section has no application at all.

On this point there are two reported decisions. In 15 Mad 181,[1] the facts were : the suit related to three parcels of land but the defendants' appeal was in respect of only one of them. The suit was valued at Rs. 480 odd. The Appellate Court held that it ought to have been valued at about Rs. 1100. The deficit court-fee not having been paid, an order was made, "original suit rejected." The learned Judges (Wilkinson and Shephard JJ.) held that the District Judge's order was irregular, on the ground "he had no jurisdiction over the whole subject matter of the suit, the appeal by defendant 4 relating to one item only." The judgment is brief, but the decision is perfectly clear. In other words, of the three possible views mentioned above, it was the second view that prevailed. It is a ruling of a Bench of our Court, which does not appear to have ever been questioned and there is no reason why we should now depart from it.

40 C W N 406[2] is the second of the two cases referred to above. There the suit related to four mortgages and the lower Court accepted Rs. 2775 to be the correct court-fee payable on the plaint. The defendants appealed in regard to a part of the suit claim, namely the amount claimed on the basis of the fourth mortgage bond alone. The Appellate Court held that the proper court-fee payable in the Court below was Rs. 6000 odd. The question arose, could the Appellate Court make an order for the payment of this entire amount? The answer was given in the affirmative. It will be seen that the decision is at variance with what was held in 15 Mad 181.[1] But from the judgment, which in this case also is very brief, it would appear that the argument that was put forward and negatived, was that indicated in position No. (iii) above. It follows therefrom that position No. (ii) did not fall to be considered in that case, that is, the position accepted in the Madras case ; nor was that case referred to or cited.

The section is not happily worded, but we think that the view taken in 15 Mad 181[1] is the most reasonable. The question then remains, what was the court-fee payable on the plaint in respect of defendant 7's one-eighth share? There is a distinct averment in the plaint, that defendant 1 is in possession of the plaintiff's share which means, that the plaintiff is out of possession. The prayer in the suit, which is in accordance with this allegation, is both for partition and separate possession. Where the plaintiff is in possession, actual or constructive, and merely seeks to change the form of his enjoyment by obtaining a divided in the place of an undivided share—in such a case there is a conflict of judicial opinion as to the appropriate provision applicable. But where, as here, the plaintiff has been excluded, upon his allegation, from possession, there can be no doubt whatsoever that the court-fee payable is ad valorem under S. 7 (v).

It is for the Government to show that the court-fee of Rs. 100 (paid in the lower Court in respect of this relief) is insufficient. It was on the assumption, that court-fee was payable on the market value of the one-eighth share (i. e., Rs. 700),

1. Kerala Varma v. Chadayankutti, (1892) 15 Mad 181.

2. Radha Ranee v. Kshetra Mohan, (1935) 63 Cal 720=40 C W N 406.

that the case was argued on behalf of the Government. But the suit property is a mitta, which it is not disputed, is an "estate", and the value of the land, is to be deemed to be, under S. 7 (v) (a) twenty times the annual revenue payable. It has not been shown what the annual revenue is; in other words, there is nothing to show that twenty times the annual revenue amounts to a figure in excess of the sum on which Rs. 100 (the amount actually paid) would be the proper court-fee. So much for the plaint in the Court below. The same remark would apply to the court-fee paid on the memorandum of appeal. Finally, one word as regards the contention in respect of the relief of declaration. The value of defendant 7's share (which alone has come before the Appellate Court) is less than Rs. 10,000 and therefore the court-fee payable on the plaint under Sch. 2, Art. 17-A (i) (Madras Amendment) is Rs. 100 and not Rs. 500 and that sum has been paid. It is unnecessary in this view to consider the other question raised, namely whether the prayer as to declaration was superfluous and therefore no court-fee was payable in respect of that relief: 56 M L J 394.[3] In the result, we must hold that the Government's contention has not been made out.

Letters Patent Appeal No. 4 of 1936, Decided on 9th November 1937, against judgment of Varadachariar J., D/- 31st October 1935, reported in A I R 1936 Mad 583.

Madras Court of Wards Act (1 of 1902), S. 49 — Person giving notice assigning his interest — Assignee need not give fresh notice before filing suit.

(Per Pandrang Row J.) — When after the notice is given as required by S. 49, the person who gives the notice dies or transfers his interest in the subject matter to another, a fresh notice has not to be given under S. 49 by the heir or transferee. A transfer of the subject matter does not affect the object for which such notice is required to be given. [P 281 C 1]

(Per Abdur Rahman J.) — Although under Cl. (2) of S. 49 an intending plaintiff is required to serve the Court of Wards with a notice in which his name, place of his abode, the cause of action and the relief which he claims are to be stated, sub-cl. (1) of the section has been so drafted as not to provide that the suit must necessarily be instituted by the very person who had served the Court of Wards with a notice: 25 All 187, Disting. [P 281 C 1]

S. T. Srinivasagopalachari — for Appellant.

Pandrang Row J. — The facts of this case have been stated by Varadachariar J. in his judgment* and it is needless to repeat them. The only point that has been decided is that the notice given in May 1928 by one Singa Dorai satisfies the conditions embodied in S. 49, Court of Wards Act. The law on the subject has been fully discussed by Varadachariar J. and there is no need to add to his discussion of the case law. The section of the Court of Wards Act which has to be construed is S. 49, which runs as follows:

1. No suit relating to the person or property of any ward shall be instituted in any Civil Court until the expiration of two months after notice in writing has been delivered to or left at the Office of the District Collector specified in the notification under S. 19 or the Collector appointed under S. 46, as the case may be.

2. Such notice shall state the name and place of the abode of the intending plaintiff, the cause of action and the relief which he claims; and the plaint shall contain a statement that such notice has been so delivered or left.

The notice given in this case completely complies with all the provisions of this section. The person who gave the notice was one Singa Dorai, the senior proprietor of the village, the proprietors of which are the present plaintiffs. He was certainly the intending plaintiff at the time the notice was given. He was the original complainant before the Survey Officer and the respondent before the Appellate Survey Officer. The notice was given because the Appellate Survey Officer's decision was against Singa Dorai. It is not pretended that any one else was the intending plaintiff at the time the notice was sent. The cause of action and the relief claimed which are given in the notice are not different from the cause of action and the relief claimed in the present suit. The plaint contains a statement that the notice was delivered or left at the offices referred in the section and this delivery is not denied. It would thus follow that all the requirements of the section have been really fulfilled. The main objection urged by the zamindar's advocate in this appeal is that Singa Dorai who gave the notice is not the actual plaintiff in the present suit in which the plaintiffs are those who derived title from him subsequent to the issue of the notice, Singa Dorai having transferred his interest in the village in August 1928 to certain persons who in turn transferred the same to the plaintiffs in September 1928. In other words, the contention of the learned advocate for the appellant is that when after the notice is given as required by S. 49, the person who gives the notice dies or transfers his interest in the subject matter to another a fresh notice has to be given under S. 49. It is difficult to see how this conclusion can be said to follow necessarily from S. 49. It certainly does not follow from the letter of this law; nor can it be said that the object of this law requires such a conclusion to be drawn. A transfer of the subject matter does not affect the object for which such notice is required to be given. I may also say that the reasons given by Varadachariar J. in support of his conclusion appear to be sound, and that the conclusion which he has come to is one in consonance with justice and is not opposed to law. There is no reason therefore why that decision should be interfered with in appeal. The appeal should accordingly be dismissed with costs.

Abdur Rahman J. — I agree. While our learned brother Varadachariar J. rejected the appeal on the ground that the notice given by Singa Dorai to the Court of Wards should be held to be available for the benefit of the persons claiming under him, I would like to rest my decision on a grammatical construction of S. 49, Court of Wards Act itself. A close perusal of this section shows that although under sub.cl. (2) an intending plaintiff is required to serve the Court of Wards with a notice in which his name, place of his abode, the cause of action and the relief which he claims are to be stated, sub.cl. (1) of the section has been so drafted as not to provide that the suit must necessarily be instituted by the very person who had served the Court of Wards with a notice. It merely enacts that no suit relating to the person or property of any ward shall be instituted in any Civil Court until the expiration of two months after notice in writing has been delivered. Had the Legislature intended that the person who had served the Court of Wards with a notice would alone be entitled to sue, it could have said so without any difficulty. It is true that when the suit is to be filed on the basis of the cause of action mentioned in the notice, the person serving the notice would ordinarily be the same as the person instituting the suit; but the person, who intended to file a suit and who actually served the Court of Wards with a notice, may have died before the suit is instituted, and his sons or heirs may have had to institute the suit instead. In that case it cannot be reasonably argued, in my opinion, that the notice served by the intended plaintiff has spent itself on account of his death and cannot be availed of by his sons or heirs. There is nothing in S. 49 of the Act which would make another notice essential as long as the suit is based substantially on the same cause of action which was stated in the notice. S. 49 appears to have been so drafted as to cover cases of this character.

The position of an assignee, on whom the interest of the intending plaintiff may devolve by a voluntary act of the latter would be the same, in my opinion, and no objection can be raised on the ground that he had not served the Court of Wards with another notice after his assignment. It may be that if his title is denied by or on behalf of the Court of Wards, he would be called upon to establish the same before he is held entitled to any relief. But if he chooses to file a suit on the cause of action stated by his assignor in the notice served on the Court of Wards no legitimate objection can be raised against him on that score. A number of cases either following or decided on the lines adopted in 25 All 187[1] were pressed upon us by the learned counsel for the appellant in support of his contention. There is no doubt that the language used in S. 80, Civil P. C. is very similar to that employed in S. 49, Court of Wards Act but there is, first of all, some difference in the manner in which the two sections were drafted, i. e., while the provisions of S. 80 are contained in one paragraph, those contained in S. 49 have been subdivided into two. This might have persuaded the learned Judges in placing a different construction of S. 80, Civil P. C., and holding that the intending plaintiff who has been referred to in the latter part of the section must be necessarily taken to refer to the same person who had served the notice. Secondly the word 'intending' before the word 'plaintiff' has now been taken out and this change appears to me to have been effected with the object of removing a doubt in construing S. 80, Civil P. C. to which it was otherwise liable. For these reasons, I consider that there is no merit in this appeal and it should be dismissed with costs.

1. Bachchu Singh v. Secretary of State, (1903) 25 All 187.

Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 904 of 1933, Decided on 24th September 1937, against decree of Addl. Sub-Judge, Coimbatore, in A. S. No. 11 of 1933.

Madras District Municipalities Act (5 of 1920), Sch. 4, R. 13—Chairman should direct party to pay amount fixed on revision—This is condition precedent to be satisfied before taking proceedings for non-payment.

Rule 13 of Sch. 4 requires that the Chairman shall direct the party to pay the amount fixed on revision within 15 days after receipt of such intimation. This is a condition precedent which the Chairman has to perform before he could take the appropriate proceedings for non-payment of the tax. It is not open to the Municipality to say that once the reduction in valuation is made, the party must ascertain what the exact amount to be paid by him is and should pay the same. The rule distinctly requires that the Chairman should direct him to pay the amount fixed on revision. The obligation of fixing the tax on revision is on the Municipality and no duty is cast on the party to fix for himself the amount he has to pay. Therefore the proceedings by way of distress taken for the non-payment of the tax without complying with this condition precedent are not legal and the levy of tax and the proceedings taken for the realization thereof ought to be set aside.

Judgment.—The only substantial question in this second appeal is whether the levy of property tax in respect of the plaintiff's house for 1926-27 by the defendant Municipality is legal. The material facts bearing on this question are not in dispute. A quinquennial revision was undertaken by the Municipality in 1926-27 in pursuance whereof a tax of Rs. 9-6-0 instead of the old tax of Rs. 5-1-7, was levied in respect of the plaintiff's house and a demand therefor made. The plaintiff preferred a revision petition against the said assessment and there was a disposal of the said revision petition in his favour by a reduction of the valuation from Rs. 324 to Rs 250. The result of this revision will be that the tax of Rs. 9-6-0 will have to be modified and before appropriate proceedings either by way of distress or suit can be taken against the plaintiff, the provisions of the rules prescribed by the statute must be complied with. Under R. 13 of Sch. 4, District Municipalities Act, > immediately after the disposal of the Revision Petition, the Chairman shall inform the petitioner, or his authorised agent, either orally or in writing, of the orders passed thereon, and shall direct him to pay the amount fixed on revision within 15 days from the date on which it becomes due, and shall if necessary cause the assessment books to be corrected.

It is admitted in this case that immediately after the disposal of the revision petition itself, there was a note made that the valuation was reduced to Rs. 250 and the petitioner's signature was taken as evidence of this fact having been communicated to him. But the rule further requires that the Chairman shall direct him to pay the amount fixed on revision within 15 days after the receipt of such intimation. Therefore this is also a condition precedent which the Chairman had to perform before he could take the appropriate proceedings for non-payment of the tax. It is admitted in this case that no such direction was given and in fact for the year 1926-27, the assessment books have not been corrected and there is nothing to indicate what exactly was the amount fixed by the Municipality on revision. It is not open to the Municipality to say that once the reduction in valuation is made, the plaintiff must ascertain what the exact amount to be paid by him is and should pay the same. That is not what the Rule says. The Rule distinctly requires that the Chairman should direct him to pay the amount, fixed on revision. The obligation of fixing the tax on revision is on the Municipality and no duty is cast on the plaintiff to fix for himself the amount he has to pay. Therefore the proceedings by way of distress taken for the non-payment of the tax, for 1926-27 are not legal, and therefore the levy of the tax and the proceedings taken for the realisation thereof ought to be set aside.

I therefore modify the decree of the lower Courts in so far as they have directed the plaintiff to pay the tax for the year 1926-27 and direct a refund of the excess levied for the said year as prayed for. The rest of the appeal fails and is dismissed. So far as the second appeal is concerned, I direct each party to bear his own costs. Leave to appeal is refused.

A. I. R. 1938 Madras 283

Padmanabha Iyer — Petitioner.

v.

Visalakshmi Achi — Respondent.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 1552 of 1936, Decided on 19th April 1937, from order of Dist. Court, West Tanjore at Tanjore, D/- 27th November 1936.

(a) Madras Revenue Recovery Act (2 of 1864), S. 40—Position of purchaser at revenue sale is similar to decree-holder—Purchaser is entitled to remedies available in execution proceedings.

The intention of the Legislature in enacting S. 40 was to place the purchaser at revenue sale for the purpose of recovering possession of the lands purchased, in the position of a decree-holder and therefore he would be entitled to such remedies as would be available to a decree-holder in execution proceedings. This view is in consonance with principle that when a duty of a particular character is cast upon an established Court, it imports that the ordinary incidents of the procedure of that Court are to attach: A. A. A. O. No. 27 of 1889; 1 M L J 594; 14 M L J 433 and 31 Mad 24, Rel. on. [P 284 C 1]

(b) Madras Revenue Recovery Act (2 of 1864), S. 40—Benami—Revenue purchase can be benami—Bar of S. 66, Civil P. C. also does not apply to benami purchaser—Process can be issued after necessary enquiry.

It is now settled law that there is nothing in the provisions of the Revenue Recovery Act which would preclude a real purchaser from contending that the purchaser in whose name the certificate is issued under S. 38, Revenue Recovery Act, was only a benamidar. The reason of the rule is that the benami purchase not being illegal must be given effect to in so far as they have not been prohibited by any enactment and even the limited bar placed by S. 66, Civil P. C. would not apply to a case of purchase at a revenue sale. The words "shall cause the proper process to be issued" in S. 40, Revenue Recovery Act, only means that on an application for delivery of possession the Court must issue the appropriate writ, but that can only be directed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, after making such an enquiry as may be necessary and is contemplated by the sections relating to such delivery of possession: 28 Mad 526 and 29 Mad 473, Ref. [P 284 C 2; P 285 C 1]

(c) Madras Revenue Recovery Act (2 of 1864), S. 38 (5) — Collector cannot go into question of benami—Once sale is confirmed, purchaser's name must be registered.

Under S. 38 (5), it would not be competent to the Collector to go into the question of benami. Under that section, once the sale is confirmed, the Collector is under an obligation to register the lands in the name of the person declared to be the purchaser and grant the certificate to such purchaser, that is the person who is declared to be the purchaser. [P 285 C 1]

T. R. Srinivasa Iyengar — for Respondent.

Order. — This is a revision petition against an order made in the course of proceedings taken under S. 40, Revenue Recovery Act, for delivery of possession of the property purchased by the petitioner in a revenue sale. The property known as Mattangal estate was brought to sale for arrears of revenue by reason of the default committed by the pattadars Karuppan Chetti and Avadayam Chetti and purchased by the petitioner Padmanabha Iyer. The said sale was confirmed on 20th June 1935 and a certificate of sale was issued in his favour under S. 38, Revenue Recovery Act. On the strength of the said certificate, he made an application to the District Court of Tanjore for delivery of possession of the said property and an order for delivery was made; but when he sought to take possession, he was obstructed by Visalakshmi Achi, the respondent herein. Thereupon the petitioner filed an application under O. 21, Rr. 95 and 98, Civil P. C., for removal of the obstruction and delivery of possession. The plea of the respondent was that the purchase of the estate was made benami for her and with the aid of her moneys, and that she soon after took possession of the estate in pursuance thereof and has been in possession of the village in her own right as the real purchaser. The learned District Judge directed an enquiry into the matter. It is against this order this civil revision petition has been filed.

The contention of Mr. V. T. Rangaswami Ayyangar on behalf of the petitioner is that the lower Court has no jurisdiction in an application under S. 40, Revenue Recovery Act to go into the question of benami, that it was bound to direct delivery of possession by removing the obstruction and that the only remedy for the respondent is only to file a suit for establishing her right. He laid considerable emphasis on the language of the section, especially the words "shall cause the proper process to be issued." S. 40, Revenue Recovery Act, has been enacted for the purpose of enabling a purchaser at a revenue sale to get possession of the property without resorting to the necessity of instituting a suit as there is no machinery provided by the Act to enable such purchaser being put in possession. The aid of the Civil Court is therefore provided for by the Legislature and the section therefore enacts that the purchaser at a revenue auction must be treated in the same manner as if the purchased lands had been decreed to the purchaser by a decision of the Court. This section was interpreted so early as 1889 by a Bench of this Court consisting of Muthusami Ayyar and Parker JJ. in A. A. A. O. No. 27 of 1889, where the learned Judges held that the intention of the enactment was to place the purchaser for the purpose of recovering possession of the land purchased in the position of a decree-holder and that he would be entitled to such remedies as would be available to a decree-holder in execution proceedings. The same learned Judges adhered to the same interpretation in 1 M L J 594[1] and they remarked thus :

If the execution of the process is obstructed, the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure become applicable. To hold otherwise, would be to defeat the intention of S. 40, Revenue Recovery Act, which gives a certificate the same force, which a decree of Court has under the Code of Civil Procedure.

This view was followed in a case reported in 14 M L J 433[2] where the learned Judges held that where a Court awarded possession under S. 40 to a purchaser at a revenue auction, restitution could be ordered on the sale being set aside. See also 31 Mad 24[3] which seems to take the same view. This view is in consonance with the principle that when a duty of a particular character is cast upon an established Court, it imports that the ordinary incidents of the procedure of that Court are to attach. It was on the application of this principle that when a question arose under S. 78, Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act, which provides that on the appointment of a trustee by the Hindu Religious Endowments Board, constituted under the Act, the Court may on application by a person so appointed and on the production of the order of appointment direct delivery of possession of the property to the trustee, Curgenven J. held that it would be in the competency of the Court to investigate an objection made to the delivery of such possession and the principle of O. 21, R. 100, could be invoked: vide A I R 1932 Mad 164[4] at p. 166. A similar view was taken by Venkatasubba Rao J. in A I R 1935 Mad 612[5] where the learned Judge observed thus :

The applications mentioned in S. 78 must under the Act be to a District Court and there is therefore no reason to hold that they are not proceedings in a Court of Civil jurisdiction within the meaning of S. 141 mentioned above. If that be so, the provisions of O. 21, Rr. 97, 98 and 99 become applicable and the Court can in virtue of the power conferred by them make the investigation.

It will be noticed that the application in this case was made by the petitioner under O. 21, Rr. 95 and 98, Civil P. C. Therefore the question whether the respondent is resisting possession at the instigation of the defaulter or on her own account has to be gone into. Her case is, she is in possession of the estate on her own account. It is now settled law that there is nothing in the provisions of the Revenue Recovery Act which would preclude a real purchaser from contending that the purchaser in whose name the certificate was issued under S. 38, Revenue Recovery Act, is only a benamidar. The decided cases show that it would be open to a defaulter to recover or to defend his possession in suits brought against or by a certified purchaser : 28 Mad 526[6] and 29 Mad 473[7]. The reason of the rule is that the benami purchase not being illegal must be given effect to in so far as they have not been prohibited by any enactment and even the limited bar placed by S. 66, Civil P. C, would not apply to a case of purchase at a revenue sale. The question of benami would be relevant for ascertaining the nature of possession of the respondent. It seems to me therefore that the order of the lower Court directing enquiry is correct. The words " shall cause the proper process to be issued "

1. Chithambaram v. Natasam, (1891) 1 M L J 594.
2. Gnanasambanda Pandara Sannadhi v. David Nadar, (1904) 14 M L J 433.

only mean that on an application for delivery of possession the Court must issue the appropriate writ, but that can only be directed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code after making such an enquiry as may be necessary and is contemplated by the sections relating to such delivery of possession.

The next contention of Mr. Rangaswami Ayyangar is that before the Collector the respondent objected to the issue of certificate in the name of the petitioner but in spite thereof the Collector issued the certificate in his name and therefore she is precluded from raising this objection. On reference to the order, I find the Collector declined to go into the said matter. It seems to me that under S. 38 (5), Revenue Recovery Act, it would not be competent to the Collector to go into the question of benami. Under that section, once the sale is confirmed, the Collector is under an obligation to register the lands in the name of the person declared to be the purchaser and grant the certificate to such purchaser, that is the person who is declared to be the purchaser. There is therefore no force in this contention of Mr. Rangaswami Iyengar. In the result, the civil revision petition fails and is dismissed with costs.

Kullappa Reddiar and others — Petitioners.

Al. Vr. St. Veerappa Chettiar and others — Respondents.

Civil Revn. Petns. Nos. 1335, 1524, 1525 and 1165 of 1934, Decided on 5th May 1937, from decrees of Dist. Court, Coimbatore, in C. M. A. Nos. 74, 77, 83 and 78 of 1932.

(a) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 53 —Applications under — Joint trial with consent of parties—Each alienation must be dealt with separately and evidence relating to each considered separately.

Where four separate applications under S. 53, are tried together with the consent of parties, it does not follow either that evidence otherwise irrelevant becomes relevant because the applications were heard together, or that because some alienations are found to be fraudulent as being not in good faith the other alienations must necessarily on that account partake of the same character. Therefore in spite of the joint trial of all the applications, the case as regards each alienation must be dealt with separately and the evidence relating to each considered separately. [P 286 C 1]

(b) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 53 — Good faith — Proof of — Absence of good faith on part of transferee must be proved — Such burden is not discharged by vague allegations of fraud — Absence of valuable consideration and circumstances reasonably leading to inference of bad faith on part of alienee must be shown.

So far as S. 53, is concerned, it is the absence of good faith on the part of the transferee that has to be proved and not the absence of good faith on the part of the transferor, the insolvent. [P 286 C 1]

The fact that there are certain circumstances appearing in the evidence on the side of the alienees which in the absence of an explanation would offer ground for suspicion is not sufficient for coming to the conclusion that the alienations fall under S. 53. The burden of proving want of good faith on the part of alienees is not discharged by mere vague allegations of fraud but only by establishing circumstances from which it can be reasonably inferred that the alienees acted in bad faith and that there was no valuable consideration for the alienations. Order.—These four revision petitions arise out of connected applications made by a creditor, Veerappa Chettiar, in I. P. No. 21 of 1927 on the file of the Subordinate Judge's Court of Coimbatore seeking to annul certain alienations made by the insolvent in October 1926. There were five alienations in all executed in October 1926 and there were five applications for annulling them. The insolvent was adjudicated as such on petitions filed on 10th and 11th January 1927. In one case the alienation was sought to be set aside under S. 54, Provincial Insolvency Act, as well as under S. 53, the other four being only applications under S. 53. The trial Court found that one of the alienations (Ex. 2) was valid and dismissed the application relating thereto, and the other four alienations were set aside. On appeal, the appeals by the unsuccessful alienees were dismissed by the Appellate Court and the appeal by the creditor in the single case in which the alienation was upheld was allowed. Five revision petitions were filed. One of them was not admitted and the other four have now to be decided.

Some argument was addressed to me on the impropriety of the joint trial and determination of all the applications together and reference was made to 60 Cal 1367[1] and 71 M L J 788.[2] It is not necessary to devote much attention to this aspect of the case because, as the learned advocate for the respondents has pointed out, the trial of these applications together was with the consent of the parties, and therefore it is not open to the petitioners in these petitions to take objection to the joint trial. This however does not mean either that the evidence otherwise irrelevant becomes relevant because the applications were heard together, or that because some alienations are found to be fraudulent as being not in good faith the others must necessarily on that account partake of the same character. In other words, in spite of the joint trial of the applications, the case as regards each alienation must be dealt with separately, and the evidence relating to it considered separately. There can be no doubt that the two Courts below have not made a real attempt to differentiate the evidence which relates to each alienation. The trial Court points out certain relationships between the parties to the alienations and the attestors thereto and these relationships were apparently allowed to lead to the conclusion that all the alienations were the result of a scheme or plot to defraud creditors. There has also been a failure to observe the distinction between the fraudulent intention of the insolvent, the transferor, and the knowledge of such intention on the part of the transferee. There can be no doubt that so far as S. 53, Insolvency Act, is concerned, it is the absence of good faith on the part of the transferee that has to be proved and not the absence of good faith on the part of the transferor, the insolvent.

The judgments of the Courts below are open to the just criticizm that the decisions therein are really founded on mere suspicion and speculation, and not on legal testimony, for, there can be no doubt that the legal testimony is utterly insufficient in law to support the inference that the alienees acted without good faith or that there was no valuable consideration for the alienations. The deeds of alienations themselves have been exhibited and the vouchers in support thereof also have been exhibited. In one of the cases the vouchers so exhibited were 17 in number namely Exs. 1.a to 1.r, the dates of which range from 1908 to 1924. There is no finding to the effect that all these promissory notes are forgeries or that any one of them is a forgery. Prima facie, the promissory notes which have been exhibited in evidence prove that the debts were real and the burden lies, apart from the general burden in cases coming under S. 53, Insolvency Act, on the person who alleges that the promissory notes are forgeries. That burden has not been discharged and indeed there is nothing but mere suspicion, and that too not of a strong character, to show that the promissory notes are not genuine. The mere relationship of the attestors and the alienees in the alienation deeds and the fact that most of the alienees belong to the same village as the insolvent are not sufficient to show either that the alienees acted in bad faith or that the alienations were without consideration. In fact, once it is found that the promissory notes are genuine, there can really be no escape from the conclusion that the alienees must have also acted in good faith. For instance, the trial Court in dealing with the alienation Ex. 1 merely observes that on account of certain suspicious circumstances and the absence of an explanation of the suspicious circumstance by the production of account books it is proved that the consideration for Ex. 1 is not real.

This is clearly a decision which is based on mere suspicion. The suspicion is entirely due to the fact that the alienees have not given an absolutely satisfactory explanation of the transaction and of the previous transactions between them and the insolvent. The evidence on the side of the petitioning creditor is almost of no value, and if the question had to be decided on the strength of the evidence on the side of the petitioning creditor there can be no doubt that the petitioner had utterly failed to prove his case. The fact that the creditors have adduced certain evidence would not discharge the burden which lies on the petitioning creditor even though such evidence is not wholly acceptable. In this case it is not as if the evidence itself has been characterized as false, but that there are certain circumstances appearing in the evidence on the side of the alienees which in the absence of an explanation would offer ground for suspicion. So far as the non-production of account books is concerned, it is not the case of the petitioning creditor that the accounts were summoned and that the alienees declined or omitted to produce accounts. It is possible that the accounts were not produced because the alienees were left under the impression that the burden was really, and not merely theoretically, on the petitioning creditor to prove his case.

In my opinion neither of the Courts below has correctly understood the nature of the burden which is thrown by law on the petitioning creditor in cases of this kind. The burden is not discharged by mere vague allegations of fraud as has been done in this case by one witness going into the witness box and saying that all the alienations are fraudulent. The burden can be discharged only if circumstances are established from which it can be reasonably inferred that the alienee acted in bad faith and that there was no valuable consideration for the alienation. Of such evidence there is none in these cases. The decisions rest on no evidence at all and must therefore be regarded as being insupportable in law. They are accordingly set aside and the applications in these four cases are dismissed with costs in this Court and in the Courts below.

City Civil Court Appeal No. 33 of 1935, Decided on 23rd July 1937, against decree of City Civil Judge, Madras, D/- 11th October 1934.

Res judicata—A obtaining decree for partition against her sister B and brother—Decree remaining unexecuted owing to agreement—Parties continuing in joint possession—Subsequent suit by A under S. 9, Specific Relief Act decreed—Subsequent suit by B for partition and possession of her share held not barred by res judicata by previous two suits.

A decree for partition obtained in 1919 by A against her sister B and brother (the parties being Christians) was not executed as the parties had agreed not to take any advantage of the decree and they continued to be in joint possession of the properties as if the decree was not in existence. The parties having fallen out in 1932, A successfully instituted a suit under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, to recover possession of the properties, of which she was dispossessed by B through her husband and her son. B thereafter filed a suit for partition and possession of her share which was contested by A as being barred by res judicata by reason of the decree in the suit of 1919 and the findings in the suit under S. 9, Specific Relief Act:

Held that the parties not having given effect to the decree in the suit of 1919 and having continued in joint possession of the properties as per subsequent agreement the second suit for partition was not barred. The decision in the suit under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, operated as res judicata only to the extent of the finding given therein that A was in possession of the properties on the day she alleged in that suit that she was dispossessed and nothing more and did not operate as a bar to the second suit. C. V. Subramania Iyer — for Appellant.

K. Venkataraghavachari —

Leach C. J. — The parties to this appeal are Indian Christians. The appellant is the eldest sister of the two respondents. Their father died in 1895 and their mother in 1906 and they were left two houses one of which was subsequently let out to tenants. The suit out of which this appeal arises was filed by respondent 1 in the City Civil Court for partition of the estate and she obtained a decree. Her brother, respondent 2, took no part in it and has taken no part in the appeal. The contest has been throughout between respondent 1 and the appellant. The appellant challenges the decision of the trial Court on grounds to which we shall shortly refer. Respondent 1's case was that in 1920 an agreement took place between the parties under which they were to enjoy the rents and profits of these houses in common. This followed a suit by the appellant in the City Civil Court for a partition of the estate. She obtained a decree awarding her a one-third share in the property and directing that it be divided between her and her brother and sister. It is common ground that no steps were ever taken to execute this decree, the reason being, according to respondent 1, the agreement to enjoy the properties equally. Thereafter she and the appellant lived amicably together until 1932 when the appellant complained that she had been forcibly dispossessed of the house which was let out to tenants and instituted criminal and civil proceedings against the husband and son of respondent 1. Up to then, respondent 1 and the appellant had been living amicably together but as the result of these legal proceedings it was no longer possible for them to continue to live together and therefore respondent 1 was forced to ask for a partition of the estate in order that she might enjoy her own share.

The defence was that respondent 1 and the appellant never lived together and that there had been no joint enjoyment of the property. The appellant claims that after the partition suit she was allowed by respondent 1 to collect the rents and enjoy the income herself. She alleges that she had given cash, jewellery, and other moveable property to respondent 1 and it was in consequence of this that respondent 1 had allowed her to remain in exclusive and adverse enjoyment and possession of the said properties in her own right and collect the rents thereof and appropriate the same to her own use.

It was also pleaded by the appellant that respondent 1's suit was barred by reason of the doctrine of res judicata. This argument was based on the decisions in the partition suit of 1919 and in Suit No. 465 of 1932 of this Court in which the appellant had sought a decree under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, and had succeeded. The learned trial Judge held that respondent 1 and her husband were not in such affluent circumstances that they could afford to let the appellant take the income of the properties for herself and he disbelieved the appellant's version. He also held that there had been no exclusive or adverse possession by the appellant and that the suit was not barred by the doctrine of res judicata. With regard to the suit of 1919, the parties had agreed not to take any advantage of the decree which had been passed therein and had continued to be in joint possession of the properties; in other words, they treated the decree as if it was not in existence. In these circumstances we agree that the decision cannot support the plea of res judicata. With regard to the second suit, that is the suit under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, the learned Judge held that a suit of that nature could not give rise to a plea of res judicata in a suit like the present, and we share his opinion. We will return to this question of res judicata in a moment.

We also consider that the learned Judge has taken the correct view of the evidence. It is impossible to hold in view of the pleadings and the evidence on record that respondent 1 and her brother ever agreed to allow the appellant to enjoy the whole of the income of the family property for the rest of her lifetime. It is true that she is the elder sister and that she is a spinster. But the agreement on which she relies was arrived at, according to her in 1920, when there was a prospect of her living for many years. Respondent 1 was not in affluent circumstances. She had four children of her own, and according to the appellant's own evidence, she was in need from time to time of financial assistance. Therefore it is very unlikely that she would ever agree to give up for many years all interest in her patrimony. With regard to the plea of res judicata it is perfectly true that the parties had agreed not to take any action on the partition decree obtained by the appellant in 1919. It would appear that the reason for that suit being filed was the fact that respondent 2 was interfering in the collection of rents; but in 1920 he received an appointment in Delhi and has lived there ever since. His transfer to Delhi removed the cause of friction and the two sisters settled down to enjoy the property as they had been enjoying it before the partition suit was filed by the appellant. In these circumstances, the suit of 1919 could not operate as res judicata. The suit under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, was brought forward to put the appellant back in possession of property which she said she was in possession of on 1st July 1932. The learned Judge who tried the case came to the conclusion that she had established that she was in possession of the house on that day. The fact that evidence with regard to what had transpired years before 1932 appears on the record and is discussed by the learned Judge does not mean that he decided anything more than that the appellant was dispossessed on the date mentioned. The suit operated as res judicata to that extent and to that extent only.

An attempt has been made to support the contention that there was consideration given by the appellant for her exclusive enjoyment of the family property. It is said that she gave her sister moneys, jewelleries and other property and that as the result of this her sister subsequently agreed to the appellant enjoying the rents exclusively. There is here no consideration for the agreement set up by the appellant and the plea is obviously an afterthought. The appeal therefore fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 1302 of 1932, Decided on 18th March 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, North Malabar, in A. S. No. 410 of 1930.

(a) Malabar Law—Karnavan — Powers of— Can make maintenance grant in favour of junior member or group of members constituting tavazhi — Such arrangements are binding on succeeding karnavan — When arrangements can be altered — Maintenance grant in favour of persons to be born included in tavazhi as one entity is valid — Such grant is capable of revision or enhancement — Such arrangements cannot be assailed by succeeding karnavan.

It is open to a karnavan of the Malabar tarwad to make grants of land in lieu of maintenance to the junior members of the tarwad and any such maintenance arrangement entered into by the karnavan in favour of a junior member or a group of members constituting a tavazhi is binding on the succeeding karnavan and cannot be set aside except for a good cause. It is open to him having regard to the circumtances then existing to substitute some other suitable arrangement. But until that is done, he cannot interfere with it : A I R 1917 Mad 78 and A I R 1926 Mad 810, Rel. on. [P 290 C 2]

It is also open to a karnavan of the Malabar tarwad to provide for the maintenance of the tavazhi including persons to be born hereafter treating it as an entity. Any such provision will not be in excess of the powers of the karnavan as such. Such maintenance arrangements are capable of revision by the karnavan and it is also open to the tavazhi to seek an enhancement according to changed circumstances. Any arrangement entered into will be treated as binding on the succeeding karnavan also until a case is made out for revision or alteration. [P 291 C 2; P 292 C 1]

If in the exercise of a discretion a karnavan makes provision for the maintenance of a tavazhi it cannot be assailed by the succeeding karnavan on the ground that it may not have been necessary at that time : A I R 1925 Mad 1158, Rel. on. [P 292 C 1, 2]

(b) Malabar Law —Karnavan—Assignment of right to redeem by way of Melcharth — When can be attacked—Assignment to member in lieu of maintenance with right to redeem is however valid in law.

If an assignment by a karnavan had been in favour of a stranger by way of a Melcharth possibly it may be open to objection that a karnavan by assigning away the right to redeem long before the period of redemption, would not be acting prudently in the interests of tarwad and would be unnecessarily fettering the exercise of the discretion of the succeeding karnavan who at the time of the expiry of the period should take the circumstances then existing as to the desirability of granting a Melcharth; but if by means of a family arrangement, the said property is allotted to a member in lieu of maintenance subject to the burden thereon, there is nothing in law to preclude him from empowering that particular member to discharge that burden and enjoy the land. O. T. G. Nambiar and C. Goundan — for Appellants.

B. Sitarama Rao and A. Achutan Nambiar — for Respondents.

Judgment — This second appeal arises out of a suit for redemption of a kanom executed in favour of the assignor of defendants 1 and 2 in or about 1913 by the then karnavan of a tarwad known as Thekkevetti tarwad. Plaintiffs 1 and 2 are the respective heads of their tavazhies which are branches of the same tarwad. Defendants 1 and 2 also belong to the same tarwad. The right of redemption is claimed by plaintiffs 1 and 2 under two karars executed by the karnavan of the tarwad, Ex. C dated 5th August 1916 in favour of plaintiff 1's branch and Ex. B dated 7th November 1916 in favour of plaintiff 2's branch. The said karars purport to be assignments of land in lieu of maintenance of the members forming the said tavazhies. There were several items of land assigned under the said karars and one of the said items assigned to each was half a share in the land which forms the subject-matter of this suit. On the dates of the said karars, the said land was subject to a kanom in favour of one Aluppukeye Ex. A dated 18th August 1913. The kanom was for a period of 12 years and the property was liable to be redeemed thereafter. The assignees under the said karar were given the power to enjoy the land after redemption of the same by paying the amount due to the kanomdar. The karnavan who executed the said karar was one Kunhambu Kurup. He is dead and defendant 8 was the karnavan on the date of the said suit. This action was resisted mainly by defendants 1 and 2. They base their claim under a document Ex 3 dated 29th June 1926, which purports to be a kanom for a sum of Rupees 2091-6-10 in renewal of not only the kanom in favour of Aluppukaye whose assignees defendants 1 and 2 were but also of another kanom dated 3rd November 1924 executed in favour of defendant 2 by defendant 8. The said kanom happened to be executed under the following circumstances.

Some of the members of the tarwad obtained a decree in O. S. No. 416 of 1920 on the file of the Additional District Munsif's Court of Tellicherry for arrears of maintenance and in execution of that decree the suit property was attached. To satisfy the attachment, the karnavan obtained leave of the Court to mortgage the said property; in pursuance of the sanction obtained from the Court, the karnavan borrowed a sum of Rs. 782 and executed Ex. 2. So, the amount for which Ex. 3 was executed was made up of the amounts due under Ex. A and Ex. 2. Therefore the contention of defendants 1 and 2 is that as there has been a fresh kanom executed by the karnavan it is no longer open to the plaintiffs to insist upon redemption of the kanom which is no longer in existence. Another contention was also advanced, viz. that the inclusion of the suit property in the two karars executed in favour of the plaintiff was in excess of the powers of the then karnavan, and defendant 8, his successor, was not bound by such an inclusion, and that he had therefore every right to deal with it. Both the lower Courts gave effect to this contention and also held that Ex. 2 was binding on the plaintiffs, and defendant 8 was competent to grant renewal in favour of defendants 1 and 2 and the suit for redemption is therefore not sustainable.

Mr. Nambiyar's main contention is that it is perfectly competent to Kumbambu Kurup, the then karnavan, who executed the karars in favour of the plaintiffs to make an assignment of the suit land in their favour and to enable them to redeem the land for the purpose of enjoying the land for their maintenance, that Exs. 2 and 3 being in derogation of the rights conferred on them is not binding on the plaintiffs, and in any event, Ex. 3 is not binding on the plaintiffs and that the plaintiffs must be allowed to redeem the property on payment of the amount due under Exs. A and 2. This last contention should in my opinion prevail. No valid ground of attack was made against Ex. 2 and in the memo of grounds of appeal no objection regarding its invalidity was raised. It is not therefore open to Mr. Nambiyar to assail it before me. I therefore proceed on the assumption that Ex. 2 is valid.

But the question remains whether Ex. 3 is valid and binding on the plaintiffs. If the plaintiff's right under Exs. C and B to redeem the kanom of Aluppukaye is valid, it follows that Ex. 3 cannot stand, and this position is not challenged by Mr. Sitarama Rao on behalf of defendants 1 and 2. The question therefore is was Kunhambu Kurup who executed the said karars within his right in including the suit property in the said karars and was he competent to confer on the plaintiffs the power to redeem the kanom of Alappukeyi? The argument of Mr. Sitarama Rao on behalf of defendants 1 and 2 may be stated thus: the assignment of lands was in favour of specific members of the tarwad, that the inclusion of the suit item was not necessary having regard to the amount that was fixed for maintenance for each member, that the suit item was only included and intended to be for the purpose of maintenance for future members of the tavazhi, that it was not competent to a karnavan of a tarwad to make a grant for future born members of the tavazhi, that the grant of the suit item was an independent and separable transaction and it is open to the succeeding karnavan to ignore it, and further the power of redemption conferred on the assignee was in the nature of a melcharth long before the period of redemption arrived and invalid and illegal. It is well settled, and it is not disputed, that it is open to a karnavan of the Malabar tarwad to make grants of land in lieu of maintenance to the junior members of the tarwad and that any such maintenance arrangement entered into by the karnavan in favour of a junior member or a group of members constituting a tavazhi is binding on the succeeding karnavan and cannot be set aside except for a good cause. It is open to him, having regard to the circumstances then existing, to substitute some other suitable arrangement. But until that is done, he cannot interfere with it: 32 M L J 97[1] and 23 M L W 584.[2]

It is not suggested in this case that the maintenance arrangement entered into by Kunhambu was not bona fide or proper at the date of the said karars. What is suggested is that the inclusion of the suit item was unnecessary having regard to the then existing circumstances as being a provision for allotment for future born members.

1. Ramaswami Pattar v. Gopalan, (1917) 4 A I R Mad 78=37 I C 659=32 M L J 97.
2. Sara Umma v. Kunhammad, (1926) 13 A I R Mad 810=94 I C 508=23 M L W 584.

To test the soundness of the argument, it is necessary to examine the document to find out what the substance of the transaction is. The relevant portion of Ex. C runs thus: (It may be noted that the contents of Ex. B are similar)

As you are now prepared to institute suit against me for the maintenance due to you from our common Thekke Veetil Tarwad, to avoid such litigation and for the welfare of the tarwad, and for the protection of the tavazhi, lands and parambas mentioned as items 1 to 12 in the schedule hereunder and one half of land item 13, which have the claim value of Rs. 1000 have, on account of the liability of the tarwad, been hereby given possession of to you, out of the tarwad properties for your maintenance and that of the descendants that may be born to the female members, hereafter in order that you shall hold in possession items 1 to 12 from this day and item 13 after the expiry of the kanom period ..... It has been settled that, after the expiry of the kanom demise, you shall pay Rs. 564-4-9, one-half of the aforesaid kanom amount and utilize one-half of the said waram, viz. 350 edangalies, of paddy in meeting the maintenance expenses of the members of your tavazhi.

It will thus be seen that this arrangement was entered into to avoid litigation and intended for the protection of the tarwad. The property that was assigned was 13 items of land including the suit item. It was elicited in the evidence that 12 items were capable of yielding Rs. 57 and it worked out at Rs. 4.12.0 per head for the 12 members in whose favour Ex. C was assigned and that items 1 to 12 were therefore sufficient for the maintenance allotment of the said branch. It may be seen that so far as the second branch is concerned, it consisted of 19 members. As I understand the document, the provision for maintenance was intended to be made for the tavazhi as a whole, members then existing and members to be born and that item 13 was not intended specifically for future born members. The entire allotment must be taken as one allotment for all the members of the tavazhi. Therefore the argument that item 13 was intended only for the future born members is not borne out by the document itself. It is contended that it is not open to a karnavan to provide for the tavazhi as such, because the tavazhi is capable of being increased by birth of future members and they will not be bound by any allotment as not being parties to the document, and further it may be fettering the exercise of the discretion of a succeeding karnavan by any such allotment, because it will not be possible to know the increase in the members of the tavazhi. There does not seem to be any specific authority in favour of this view which Mr. Sitarama Rao contends for, but at any rate, there are indications in some of the decided cases that it may be competent to make such a provision. In 18 I C 234,[3] dealing with a karar in that case, Sundara Iyer J. observes at page 235 :

There was no contract between the karnavan and plaintiff 1's mother as representing her branch of the tarwad. It cannot therefore be said that the karar was binding on the tavazhi of the plaintiffs as such until properly set aside.

In 21 I C 755,[4] dealing also with a karar in that case, their Lordships observe thus at page 756 :

There is no provision in the body of the document showing any fixed amount in kind or money as payable to the tavazhi. It will be seen that what is paid is in terms stated to be for the maintenance of five persons only, that is plaintiffs 1 to 5; nothing is said about those who may become members of the tarwad by birth who are clearly entitled to maintenance. No obligation is implied on plaintiffs 1 to 5 to maintain them out for their allowance.

In 49 M L J 121,[5] Phillips J. made the following observation at page 122 :

Both the lower Courts have found that the karar was merely an allotment for the maintenance of the members of the tavazhi who were alive at its date. This would be a rather curious position in a Malabar tavazhi of this size, because a large number of the members are adult women and it may be ordinarily expected that children would be born shortly after the date of the karar, and it is unreasonable to conclude that after-born children are intended to be deprived of the benefits of this karar unless it is so stated. It must be remembered that at the time when this karar was entered into, there had been disputes and litigation in the tarwad and the allotments for the maintenance were made in settlement of those disputes, and therefore it is unlikely that intention of those parties was that this settlement should be subject to modification immediately other members were born. Here, we have recitals in the document which show clearly that the allotment was made to the tavazhi as such which would include not only the members then alive but also members born thereafter.

On appeal from his judgment their Lordships, Waller and Madavan Nair JJ., in 23 M L W 584[2] took a different view as regards the construction of the document but did not dissent from the view expressed by Phillips J. that allotment can be made in favour of the tavazhi as such, that is for existing members and also for members to be born. No doubt they are all cases in which it was found on a construction of the document that the allotment was made in favour of specific existing members; but at any rate, those cases seem to contemplate the possibility of such an allotment being made and that it will not be in excess of the powers of a karnavan as such. Nothing has been shown to me why a tavazhi should not be treated as an entity and provision be made as such for it. The only objection indicated is that it is not possible to predicate the number of members a tavazhi may consist, and the allotment may be more than necessary or not be adequate for the maintenance of the members for all time to come. If the law is that these maintenance arrangements are capable of revision by the karnavan and it is also open to the tavazhi to seek an enhancement according to changed circumstances, I do not see any force in the said objection. The arrangement will be treated as binding until a case is made out for revision or alteration. However it is unnecessary to rest any decision on this ground, as even treating the assignment as one intended to be in favour of only the existing members, the inclusion of items 13 cannot be considered to be an act done by the karnavan in excess of his powers. What was contemplated by the parties was that the assignees should have the income from all these 13 items and for the first 8 years they should be content with the income from 12 items and thereafter after redeeming the said kanom they should enjoy also the income from item 13.

It is not suggested that the addition of the income derivable from item 13 would in any way make the rate of maintenance excessive; on the other hand, it appears from the evidence of the present karnavan that the proper maintenance for each member would be Rs. 5 or 6 per month. No doubt plaintiff 1 in his deposition stated that at the time the arrangement was entered into, Rs. 4.12.0 was taken as the basis of calculation. It may be so, but there is nothing improper for a karnavan to safeguard the possible decrease in the rate intended to be provided for having regard to the bad seasons by including also item 13. It would seem to me proper and prudent on the part of a karnavan to make such a provision and if in the exercise of his discretion a karnavan does so, it cannot be assailed by the succeeding karnavan that it may not have been necessary at that time. The question in all these cases is as pointed out by Kumaraswami Sastri J. in 33 Mad 436[6] at p. 438, was the transaction at the time it was entered into bona fide proper and prudent? Therefore having regard to all the surrounding circumstances on the date of the karars, the inclusion of item 13 was certainly within the competence of the karnavan and no valid reason has been assigned against its inclusion. Again, it is not open to a succeeding karnavan without upsetting the arrangement as a whole to withdraw a portion of the land allotted. It may be open to him to revise the entire arrangement and substitute some other arrangement but he has not chosen to do so. However, as I have said, there is nothing unreasonable in also allotting item 13 for maintenance. Therefore the view of the lower Court in this behalf is unsound and cannot stand.

It remains to notice the other argument of Mr. Sitarama Rao whether it was competent to the karnavan to empower the plaintiffs to redeem the kanom long before the period arrived. If the assignment had been in favour of a stranger by way of a melcharth, possibly it may be open to objection that a karnavan, by assigning away the right to redeem long before the period of redemption, would not be acting prudently in the interest of tarwad and would be unnecessarily fettering the exercise of the discretion of the succeeding karnavan who at the time of the expiry of the period, should take the circumstances then existing as to the desirability of granting a melcharth; but, if by means of a family arrangement, the said property is allotted to a member in lieu of maintenance subject to the burden thereon, there is nothing in law to preclude him from empowering that particular member to discharge that burden and enjoy the land. Mr. Sitarama Rao frankly confesses that there is no authority in support of the view that it would be in excess of the powers of the karnavan to do so. Therefore if the allotment of item 13 cannot be interfered with and the plaintiffs have got a valid right to redeem the kanom of Aluppukeyi, Ex. 3 cannot stand; but it is open to the plaintiffs to redeem only the Aluppukeyi's kanom; they are also bound to redeem the kanom in favour of defendant 2 created by Ex. 2.

I therefore set aside the decree of the learned District Judge and give leave to the plaintiffs to redeem the suit properties on payment of the amount due under the kanom in favour of Aluppukeyi and also under Ex. 2. In the circumstances, I direct each party to bear his own costs in this second appeal and in the Courts below. The amount which has been agreed that the plaintiff should pay for redeeming the land is Rs. 2039.14.10. Time for redemption is six months from this date.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 1747 of 1931, Decided on 20th September 1937, from judgment of Sub-Judge, Kumbakonam, in O. S. No. 3 of 1930.

 Civil P. C. (1908), O. 34, R. 1—Attaching creditor, so long as attachment subsists, is necessary party to suit on mortgage—But if he sells judgment-debtor's property in execution of his decree and purchases it himself he is no longer necessary party.

No doubt, ordinarily a Court should deal with the rights of the parties as they stood at the institution of the suit, but where the continued existence of those rights is an essential requisite for according the relief asked for and such rights have been lost before the relief could be granted, the Court cannot but take notice of the altered circumstances and decline to give the parties that relief to which by their own act, they have disentitled themselves. Though an attaching creditor as such is not a necessary party to a suit on a mortgage and an order striking his name out in so far as he purports to assert a paramount claim and raises questions of priority is also correct, yet by virtue of the statutory right of redemption conferred under S. 91 (f) of the Transfer of Property Act, he will be proper party to the suit and it is not open to a Court to strike out the name of a party as an unnecessary party if he is otherwise a proper party to the suit. Even apart from S. 91, an attaching creditor may in certain cases be permitted to intervene and be made a proper party to the suit for the purpose of safeguarding his rights, i. e., to see that the interest of his judgment-debtor which might be sold under the mortgage decree to be passed is correctly determined. But if the attaching creditor proceeds to sell the property in execution of his decree, the Court sale releases the property altogether from attachment and with it the right of redemption which the statute confers on him and such rights as he can allege as an attaching creditor also go with it and he is no longer a necessary party. Venkataramana Rao J.—This is an application to revise the order of the learned Subordinate Judge of Kumbakonam striking out the names of the petitioners, who had been impleaded as defendants 18 to 20 in O. S. No. 3 of 1930 as unnecessary parties thereto. The argument of the learned counsel for the petitioners before us is that though they may not be necessary parties, they having been made parties to the suit, it is not open to the learned Judge to pass the order he did. The relevant facts to deal with this contention are few and not in dispute. The petitioners obtained a decree for money in O. S. No. 41 of 1915 on the file of the Subordinate Judge of Kumbakonam on 22nd December 1916 against certain defendants personally and against certain defendants as legal representatives of their predecessor-in-title. Subsequent to the date of this decree, the plaintiff in the suit out of which this application arises obtained a mortgage on 16th October 1919 from defendants 1 to 17 in the suit, some of whom were parties to the suit, O. S. No. 41 of 1915, and some of whom were represented therein by their predecessor-in-title. The present suit, O. S. No. 3 of 1930, was instituted to enforce the said mortgage and the present petitioners were impleaded as defendants 18 to 20 on the ground that they attached the mortgaged properties in execution of their decree and the said attachment was subsisting. The petitioners pleaded inter alia that they had a paramount claim by virtue of their decree in O. S. No. 41 of 1915, that they were entitled to priority, and that they were therefore not necessary parties to the suit. One of the issues in the suit relates to this question of priority. Of course they also raised other defences regarding the truth and validity of the mortgage and the extent of interest that would properly pass under the deed of mortgage. They were not allowed to raise issues which would not be open to the mortgagors.defendants to raise but were allowed to remain on record to safeguard their interests by an order dated 3rd November 1930. But when the suit came on for trial, the trial Judge took the view that having regard to the pleadings in the case they were unnecessary parties to the suit and he therefore directed their names to be struck out and subsequently passed a preliminary decree in favour of the plaintiff on 22nd July 1931. Subsequent to the date of this decree, petitioners proceeded to execute their decree in O. S. No. 41 of 1915, brought the properties to sale in pursuance of the attachment already effected by them and purchasing the properties themselves on 10th October 1931. It is subsequent to this purchase that the petitioners preferred this revision petition and also the appeal (Appeal No. 570 of 1931) complaining against their removal from the record. Subsequent to the filing of the revision petition and the appeal, a final decree was passed in the suit, O. S. No. 3 of 1930 and the mortgaged properties were brought to sale and purchased by the plaintiff. Thus the legal positions which the plaintiff in O. S. No. 3 of 1930 and the petitioners occupy are these: The plaintiff in O. S. No. 3 of 1930 is a purchaser in execution of the mortgage decree obtained by him and the petitioners are auction.purchasers in execution of the money decree obtained by them, subsequent to the preliminary decree on mortgage obtained by the plaintiff in O. S. No. 3 of 1930. The question is whether on this state of facts we ought to interfere with the order of the learned Subordinate Judge.

So far as our High Court is concerned, in cases governed by the Transfer of Property Act before the Amendment it was settled by the decision of the Full Bench reported in 53 Mad 881,[1] that an attaching creditor is not a necessary party to a suit on a mortgage. The view of the learned Subordinate Judge that the petitioners as attaching creditors are not necessary parties is correct. Again, his order striking their names out in so far as they purported to assert a paramount claim and raised questions of priority is also correct. But is his order justified if the petitioners are viewed simply as attaching creditors? They may not be necessary parties in that the plaintiff cannot be compelled to join them on the ground that no effective decree could be passed without their being on the record but by virtue of the statutory right of redemption conferred under S. 91 (f), Transfer of Property Act, they will be proper parties to the suit and it is not open to a Court to strike out the name of a party as an unnecessary party if he was otherwise a proper party to the suit. But the question still remains whether in view of the altered circumstances as a result of the Court auction purchase the petitioners can be given the relief they seek in their revision petition. The principle upon which an attaching creditor is given the right of redemption is stated by Wallis C. J. in 44 Mad 232,[2] thus:

> He is merely allowed, while the attachment is in force, to exercise any right of redemption the judgment-debtor may be entitled to for the purpose of bringing the judgment-debtor's interest to sale in execution of his decree more advantageously than if it were sold subject to the mortgage.

Even apart from S. 91, an attaching creditor may in certain cases be permitted to intervene and be made a proper party to the suit for the purpose of safeguarding his rights, i. e., to see that the interest of his judgment.debtor which might be sold under the mortgage decree to be passed is correctly determined. But this again is to enable him to effect a more advantageous sale of the interest of his judgment.debtor. The reason of the rule however disappears when the attachment ceases to be in force and an attaching creditor sheds the character of an attaching creditor either when the attachment is raised or is otherwise put an end to. It is on the basis of this principle our High Court has taken the view in 43 Mad 696[3] and 44 Mad 232,[2] since affirmed by the Full Bench in 53 Mad 881,[1] that if the attaching creditor proceeds to sell the property in execution of his decree the Court sale releases the property altogether from attachment and with it the right of redemption which the statute confers on him and such rights as he can allege as an attaching creditor also go with it. Wallis C. J. explains the position thus in 44 Mad 232[2] at p. 240 :

> Coming now to the attaching creditor's alleged right to redeem any mortgage there may be on the attached property, it follows that this right must also come to an end together with the attachment itself on the sale to the auction purchaser in execution of the decree. Thereafter the attaching creditor has no concern with the property, while on the other hand the auction-purchaser has acquired any equity of redemption, or right to redeem the mortgaged property, that the judgment-debtor may have had in the property, and there is no necessity or justification for holding that the attaching creditor's right to redeem is transferred to the purchaser in the Court sale in execution of his decree.

What the Court auction-purchaser acquires is only the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor and not the right of the attaching creditor and thereafter he can only agitate such rights as the judgment-debtor has. The fact that the attaching creditor himself becomes the purchaser is immaterial : Vide 43 Mad 696.[3] It is essential therefore that the petitioners should have maintained that character of attaching creditors if they wanted to assert the rights which the law confers upon them in order to enable them to effect an advantageous sale of the judgment-debtor's property. But where an attaching creditor proceeds to sell the property without having the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor defined, the purchaser can only get such rights as he had at the date of the sale. What the petitioners should have done is they should have come immediately after the passing of the order dated 20th July 1931 and got the order revised and the preliminary decree re-opened before proceeding to sell the property. But they elected to proceed with the execution of their decree and sell such right as the judgment-debtor had at the time of sale. If the present order is set aside, their position will in the suit be not as attaching creditors but as auction-purchasers and they can only agitate such rights as the judgment-debtors had on the date of the preliminary decree in O. S. No. 3 of 1930. No doubt, ordinarily a Court should deal with the rights of the parties as they stood at the institution of the suit, but where the continued existence of those rights is an essential requisite for according the relief asked for and such rights have been lost before the relief could be granted, the Court cannot but take notice of the altered circumstances and decline to give the petitioners that relief to which they by their own act in bringing the property to sale before filing the petition, they have disentitled themselves.

We therefore decline to interfere with the order of the learned Subordinate Judge and dismiss the revision petition but in the circumstances we make no order as to costs. The memo of objections is dismissed but without costs.

Sri Rajah Venkataramayya Appa Rao Bahadur Zamindar Garu and others — Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 1169 of 1932, Decided on 29th July 1937, against decree of Court of Sub-Judge, Ellore, in A. S. No. 212 of 1930.

(a) Madras Regulation (28 of 1802), S. 34, Cl. 6 — Legal relationship and nature of rights and obligations between zamindar and tenant whose tenure is attached under Cl. 6 explained.

The attachment of property under Cl. 6 of S. 34, does not amount to a transfer of property nor a right to call for transfer of property. The only right conferred is to manage the property until the amount due or to be due is discharged. No right of disposal over the property is given. But for the statutory power, the landlord would have no right to enter in the land. The possession of the tenant is displaced by virtue of the statute and it is not therefore by virtue of any confidence reposed by the defaulting tenant in the zamindar that possession is taken, but in opposition to and in derogation of his rights as owner to remain in possession, and therefore the relationship thus created by attachment can in no sense be one of trustee and cestui que trust. [P 297 C 1]

(b) Limitation Act (1908), S. 10—Pre-settlement mokhasa in certain zamindari attached in 1831 under Cl. 6 of S. 34, Madras Regulation 28 of 1802 — Zamindari sold for arrears and came in possession of Government— Government resumed mokhasa in 1856, wrote off arrears and regranted it unconditionally to zamindar in 1860 — Zamindar held it since then in his own right — Mokhasadar having knowledge of resumption, acquiescing in and abandoning his right in mokhasa — Suit for possession brought in 1927—It was alleged that zamindar was trustee and no question of limitation arose — No trust held was created — Time held began to run from date of disclaimer and suit was time-barred.

A village in a certain zamindari was a pre-settlement mokhasa subject to a kattubadi and thus being an 'alienated land' Government had right of resumption under Cl 4 of Regulation 25 of 1802. The zamindari was under the management of Court of Wards. In 1831, the mokhasa was attached for arrears of rent under Cl. 6, S. 34 of the Regulation 28 of 1802. Zamindari itself was sold for arrears of peshkush in 1851 and came into possession of the Government and remained with them till 1860. In 1856 Government resumed the mokhasa and incorporated it with the Government land but obligation to pay kattubadi still remained. The Government as owner of the zamindari wrote off the arrears. As they had to pay a large amount of kattubadi to the zamindar they regranted the mokhasa unconditionally to the zamindar with the zamindari in 1860. From that time zamindar was holding the mokhasa in his own right free and discharged of all claims of the mokhasadars. The resumption proceedings were with the knowledge of the mokhasadars who acquiesced in the same and abandoned their rights in the mokhasa and the conduct of the zamindar was also consonant with that view. An attempt was made in 1884 to recover possession of the mokhasa but failed. A suit was brought in 1927 for the possession and it was alleged that the original entry on the land by the zamindar was as trustee and the suit therefore was not time-barred :

Held that relationship created by attachment of mokhasa in 1831 was not one of trustee and cestui que trust. Assuming that there was a fiduciary relation created, it was put to an end by the resumption of the mokhasa by the Government writing off the arrears and regranting it in 1860 to the zamindar who held the mokhasa in his own right. Even assuming that by virtue of statutory obligation to account for the management and to deliver possession of land a constructive trust could be raised, there was open disclaimer of the title of the mokhasadars and the renunciation of the character of possession set the statute of limitation running from the date of disclaimer or renunciation. The suit therefore was time-barred : 34 Mad 257 (P C), Disting.

Judgment. — This second appeal arises out of a suit for the recovery of possession of 1/36th share in a mokhasa known as Thimmaraogundem situated within the geographical limits of Baharjalli Pargana in Nidadavolu zamindari. Both the lower Courts dismissed the suit as barred by limitation. Defendants 1 and 2 and their predecessors-in-title, the zamindars, got into possession of the said mokhasa nearly a century ago and from 1856, at any rate for nearly 70 years, they have been in open, continuous and undisturbed possession of the same and enjoying the property in their own right. It was alleged that their original entry into the land was as trustees; they were never divested of their possession as such trustees and no question of limitation arises. To appreciate the points in controversy between the parties, it is necessary to set out a few relevant facts.

The village of Thimmaraogundem was admittedly a pre-settlement mokhasa (vide Ex. A) and subject to a kattubadi of Rs 960-0-0 at the date of the Permanent Settlement of the zamindari. It is thus an "alienated land" within the meaning of the Preamble to the Madras Regn. 31 of 1802 and the right of resumption inhered in the Government by virtue of the power reserved under Cl. 4, Madras Permanent Settlement Regn. 25 of 1802. This position cannot seriously be disputed especially after the recent pronouncement of the Privy Council reported in 46 M L W 7.[1] Between 1802 and 1860 the zamindari of Nidadavolu has a chequered history. It was being badly mismanaged by the zamindars for the time being and came into the possession of the Government three times. In 1831, the Government was in management of the zamindari through the Court of Wards. They found that the kattubadi payable by the mokhasadars was in arrears. Under the law then prevailing, it was open to the landlords to realise arrears of rent due to them without resorting to Courts of law by distraint of personal property or by attachment of the farms and tenures of defaulters and realising all rents therefrom. The Court of Wards chose to adopt the latter course with reference to the suit mokhasa. They therefore attached it and this was in pursuance of the power conferred by Cl. 6 of S. 34, Madras Regn. 28 of 1802. It is to this clause one has to look for the definition of the legal relationship between the zamindar and the mokhasadar and the nature of their rights and obligations. The material provisions of Cl. 6 relevant for the purpose of the present discussion runs thus :

> The proprietors or farmers of land to whom such arrear may be owing shall have power to attach the farm or other tenure of such defaulters, and to manage the same by their own agents, until the rent due, and the further rent which may become due after attachment, with interest upon the whole arrear at the rate of one per cent per mensem, may have been liquidated ; but in such cases of attachment, proprietors, or > farmers, shall not exact more from the cultivators of the soil, and other descriptions of inferior tenantry, whose rents for the current year may have been payable to the defaulters, than the defaulters would have been entitled to receive from them if the attachment had not taken place ; and in the event of the defaulters making good the arrear due from them, with interest at the rate of one per cent. per mensem, at any time within the current year, the attachment shall be withdrawn, and an account rendered to them of the receipts and disbursements, during the continuance of such attachment.

Therefore this provides a statutory remedy for the discharge of the tenants' obligations to pay rent. There is no transfer of property nor is there a right to call for a transfer of property. The only right conferred is to manage the property until the amount due or to be due is discharged. No right of disposal over the property is given. But for the statutory power, the landlord would have no right to enter on the land. The possession of the tenant is thus displaced by virtue of the statute. It is not therefore by virtue of any confidence reposed by the mokhasadars in the zamindar that possession is taken but in opposition to and in derogation of his rights as owner to remain in possession. The relationship thus created by the attachment can in no sense be one of a trustee and cestui que trust. This then is the legal relationship which subsisted between the zamindar and the mokhasadar flowing from and out of the attachment of the mokhasa with a right on the part of the Government in exercise of their sovereign power to resume it. The zamindari itself was sold for arrears of peshkush in 1843 and regranted to the zamindar in 1845. Again in 1851 the zamindari was sold for arrears of peshkush and came into the possession of the Government and remained with them till 1860. During this time the Government took serious steps to set right the affairs of the zamindari. They found that considerable arrears of kattubadi were payable to the zamindar not only with reference to the suit mokhasa but also with reference to 31 other mokhasas. So far as the suit mokhasa was concerned, as the learned Subordinate Judge points out, > the village became a beehiraku village and in fact not even Rs. 200 could be realized by the rents of the village whereas the kattubadi was Rs. 987-8-0.

The Government decided on resuming this mokhasa and other mokhasas unless the mokhasadars came to terms in regard to the arrears. The Collector gave notices in 1856 to the mokhasadars of this village as well as the mokhasadars of other villages. From Exs. 13 and 13-A, it is clear that some of the mokhasadars adjusted the matter with the Government and others did not, and in regard to those that failed to adjust, the Government decided to resume them and incorporate them with Government land. One of such mokhasas which the Government chose to resume and incorporate with the Government property was the suit mokhasa. The Collector points out that in spite of notices and proclamations the mokhasadars failed to appear. There were arrears of over Rs. 18,000 due in respect of this mokhasa. Having regard to the then state of the village, as pointed out by the learned Subordinate Judge, the mokhasadars did not care to appear and lay claim to the village. The Government accordingly resumed it and made it part of the Government property, but still the obligation to pay the kattubadi remained. As the Government were then considering themselves as the owners of the zamindari, they wrote off the arrears. But when the sale of the zamindari was set aside, the question was as to what to do with the village. Having regard to the fact that they had to pay this large amount of kattubadi to the zamindar they granted the village unconditionally to the zamindar along with the zamindari in 1860. The result of these resumption proceedings and the grant to the zamindar was to put an end to any relationship or obligations created by the attachment of mokhasa in 1831. The zamindar from 1860 was holding the mokhasa in his own right free and discharged of all claims of the mokhasadars. The accounts of the zamindari maintained by the karnams, who belong to the family of mokhasadars, seem to be almost decisive of the fact that the resumption was acquiesced in and the old relationship came to an end : vide Exs. 12 and 14 particularly the latter which shows that after 1860 there was no debit of kattubadi or any adjustment of the income therefor in the zamindari accounts.

Both the lower Courts, after a consideration of the entire evidence, the probabilities of the case, the surrounding circumstances that prevailed at or about the time of resumption, and the subsequent conduct of the parties, found that the resumption proceedings were with the knowledge of the mokhasadars and they acquiesced in the same and abandoned their right to the mokhasa. The conduct of the zamindars was also in consonance with this view. In 1884, an attempt was made to recover possession of the mokhasa but it failed. Subsequently, there were two litigations launched (O. S. No. 9 of 1890 on the file of the Sub-Court, Ellore, and O. S. No. 88 of 1895 on the file of the District Munsif's Court of Ellore) for recovery of possession of the zamindari. In both the litigations the zamindar set up exclusive title. In the judgment in the second litigation it was distinctly found that the arrear due to the zamindar was discharged long prior to the suit. After the dismissal of these suits, no further attempt was made until 1927 for a period of 30 years when the present suit was launched. Thus for over a period of 70 years, the zamindars have been in possession and enjoyment of the suit mokhasa in their own right. The conduct of the parties at any rate up to 1884 has been on the footing that the resumption proceedings were valid. Again after open disclaimer by the zamindars of the title of the mokhasadars and setting up their own hostile title, the previous state of affairs was allowed to remain and the zamindars were allowed to continue in undisturbed possession of the same for over 30 years. A clearer case of abandonment of right cannot be found and it is highly inequitable that the mokhasadars should be entitled to disturb "the lengthened enjoyment or the immunity" to which they have been tacit parties. Both the Courts were therefore perfectly justified in finding a case of abandonment of right and change in the character of possession whatever may be the nature of the original possession, whether resumption proceedings were legal or illegal.

In this connexion I may point out that the view taken by the lower Appellate Court, that the resumption by the Government is not legal is wrong. The Government were not resuming the mokhasa qua zamindar but as Government in the exercise of their undoubted power vested in them, that they were conscious of this is clearly proved by Exs. 13, 13-A and 14. The resumption by the Government is thus valid and the mokhasadars had no right to question it and the plaintiff has no cause of action to sustain this suit. Mr. Lakshmanna's first concern was to attempt to displace the concurrent findings of both the Courts that mokhasadars were aware of and acquiesced in the resumption and abandoned their right to the mokhasa. His main argument is that Ex. 6 does not refer to resumption at all, and that the learned Subordinate Judge erred in relying on it for his finding. It will be seen that the learned Subordinate Judge relied on Ex. 6 for the purpose of shewing that the Government from the time they got into possession wanted to have the arrears adjusted with the proprietors of the various mokhasas and the plaintiff's predecessor-in-title was sent for and called upon to adjust the arrears. This is taken as one of the circumstances for probabilizing the accuracy of the statement in Ex. 13-A that the mokhasadars were given notice of resumption and that the regular procedure has been followed and coupled with other circumstances, he therefore inferred as a fact that the mokhasadars were aware of the resumption and acquiesced in the same. The learned Subordinate Judge referred to all the material documents and probabilities and arrived at the findings. Mr. Lakshmanna has not been able to convince me that the findings are wrong, and they have therefore to be accepted in second appeal. Once the findings are accepted, much of the basis for Mr. Lakshmanna's argument disappears. However, I will notice his legal contentions. He contended that by virtue of the attachment the zamindar became an express trustee, that the property was vested in him for the specific purpose of discharging arrears and that no question of limitation would arise by virtue of S. 10, Lim. Act. I have already explained the legal effect of the attachment. The taking possession by the zamindar does not vest in him any control over the property. There was no transfer or conveyance to the zamindar in trust and therefore no vesting within the meaning of S. 10, Lim. Act : 44 Mad 831.[2] The argument thus based on the question of express trust must therefore fail.

Mr. Lakshmanna placed considerable reliance on two cases of the Bombay High Court, namely 8 Bom 585[3] and 39 Bom 572[4] and very properly refrained from taking the time of the Court by citation of numerous cases as was done in the lower Courts. The case in 8 Bom 585[3] is distinguishable. There was a taking of vatan land by the Government at the request of rival claimants pending the settlement of a dispute. As pointed out by West J. himself, who delivered the judgment in the 8 Bom 585,[3] in a later case 11 Bom 222[5] at p. 233, the Government did not set up a title of their own. Here the Government resumed the property, treated it as the Government property and granted it as such in derogation of the rights of the mokhasadar. In 39 Bom 572,[4] a communication by the Government to a party that they are holding some money of his in their hands was held to amount to a sufficient declaration of trust to constitute the Government an express trustee. Such a declaration is wanting in the present case. If there was no express trust, the bar of limitation must apply and it is not disputed that the statute of limitation does apply to a case of constructive or implied trust. Assuming that by virtue of the statutory obligation to account for the management and to deliver possession of the land a constructive trust can be raised, there has been open disclaimer of the title of the mokhasadars and the renunciation of the character of possession which will set the statute running from the date of the disclaimer of renunciation.

Mr. Lakshmanna placed considerable reliance on the decision in 34 Mad 257[6] for the position that until a person who has taken possession of the properties as trustee has divested himself of that character, no question of adverse possession would arise. But the principle of that decision would not apply to the facts of this case. There has been a complete divestment of any fiduciary character, assuming the zamindar held such. All that is necessary is that such relationship as flowed from the attachment of the mokhasa should be put an end to and the resumption proceedings did put an end to the attachment and both the zamindar and the mokhasadar treated the whole thing as at an end. Further, once it is found, as already pointed out by me, in the litigation of 1898 that the arrears have been wiped out, at any rate from that date the possession of the zamindar must be deemed to be wrongful and the cause of action would instantly accrue and the right to sue has therefore become barred. In my opinion the cause of action accrued to the zamindar even on the date of the resumption. Viewed from any stand-point, the plaintiff's claim appears to be hopelessly barred. The action seems to be purely a speculative one. The decisions of the lower Courts are right and the second appeal therefore fails and is dismissed with the costs of respondent 1. Leave to appeal refused.

Appeal No. 328 of 1931, Decided on 30th July 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Bezwada (Principal), D/- 30th November 1928.

Insolvency—Sale deed by Receiver of insolvent's family property—Insolvent father possessing power to sell son's share at time of vesting of property in Receiver—Consideration for sale representing value of whole property—Sale held of entire property including son's share.

The Official Receiver of an insolvent's estate has the power to sell the son's share of the family property when such power was possessed by the insolvent father at the time when the estate vested in him. But there is a difference between the mere existence of the power and the exercise of it. The mere existence of the power is not sufficient to show that in any particular case the Official Receiver had exercised it. [P 300 C 1]

Where the sale deed executed by the Official Receiver of an insolvent father's estate and the evidence of the purchaser showed that what was intended to be sold and purchased was the entire property for a consideration which represented the value of the whole property and not merely the insolvent's own half share after excluding the son's half share, and the Official Receiver had the power on that day to sell the son's share also:

Held that it must be deemed that the power to sell the son's share was exercised by the Official Receiver and that the sale was of the entire property : A I R 1935 Nag 193, Expl.

Pandrang Row J.—This is an appeal from the decree of the Principal Subordinate Judge of Bezwada in O. S. No. 61 of 1927, a suit for recovery of possession of a certain house in Bezwada together with damages for use and occupation, the suit being brought by the plaintiff on behalf of a certain charitable institution for which this house along with other property was purchased by the then Secretary of the institution from the Official Receiver of Guntur District in whom the estate of the insolvent in I. P. No. 42 of 1922 on the file of the District Court of Guntur had been vested. Defendant 2 in this suit, who is the appellant in this appeal, was a minor son of the insolvent at the time, and it is conceded on his behalf that at the time of the sale by the Official Receiver the latter had the power to sell the son's share as such power was vested in the insolvent father. The real question for decision in the appeal is whether this power to sell the son's share was actually exercised by the Official Receiver or whether what was sold by the Official Receiver was only the insolvent father's own half share in the house. This point was answered in favour of the plaintiff by the Court below and the appellant contends that this finding is wrong.

There is no doubt a difference between the existence of a power and its exercise, and, no doubt, the mere existence of the power will not be sufficient to show that in any particular case it was exercised. In this case however, the document itself executed by the Official Receiver shows that what he intended to sell was the entire property and not merely the insolvent's own half share. There is no reference to the insolvent's half share in the deed nor is there any reference to the son's share or even to the existence of a son. The schedule annexed to the sale deed Ex.A clearly describes the property as having certain boundaries and so on. In the body of the document, it is said that what is sold is the interest or right of the insolvent in the property described in the schedule, and there is the usual clause found in sale deeds executed by Official Receivers to the effect that the purchaser must take the risk of any defect in the title. It is well-known that the Receiver is bound by his duty to sell the entire property of the insolvent for the benefit of the creditors, and where, as in this case, the insolvent's property included not merely his own share but also the power to sell his son's share in respect of his antecedent debts not tainted by illegality or immorality, it would have been contrary to his duty for him to have sold only the father's half share. On the other hand, it is most unlikely that the purchaser, who was making the purchase on behalf of a charity, would have purchased a half share in the properties.

Apart from this question of probability, we have the evidence of the Official Receiver as well as that of the purchaser to show that it was the entire property that was intended to be sold and that was actually sold. Their evidence was accepted by the Court below, and we see no reason to take a different view of their evidence. Both of them are respectable persons and their evidence is perfectly in accord with probabilities. Their evidence is further corroborated by the sale notice issued by the Receiver which makes it clear that the entire property was to be sold. There is nothing in our opinion in the passages in Mayne's Hindu Law and Usage which were quoted before us from S. 321, Edn. 9 which really helps the appellant in this case. A I R 1935 Nag 193[1] also does not really assist the appellant. In that very case it is stated that it is open to the purchaser to give evidence as to what he thought he was purchasing, and that such evidence could be directed to show that the consideration represented the value of the whole property and not merely the father's share. Even from that point of view, it is clear that in the case before us what was sold was the entire property and not merely the father's share.

On the whole therefore we are unable to see any good reason for interfering with the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge on this point. No other point has been argued before us in this appeal which is accordingly dismissed with costs of respondent 1 (plaintiff). The court-fee payable on the memorandum of appeal must be paid by the appellant to the Government.

Madhavan Nair J.—The plaintiffs who are reversioners are the appellants and their suit was to set aside an alienation made by a widow (Ex. 3) in 1875. The facts are these: One Sham Bhatta died in or about the year 1870. He left behind him his minor son Narayana who died in 1874 when he was about eight years old, a widow Lakshmi, his mother Aithamma and his brother's widow Gangamma. Lakshmi died in or about the year 1913. In 1875, she sold the suit property (Ex. 3) to the father of defendant 1 and another. The present suit is to set aside the alienation. To examine the nature of the consideration for the sale, we have to refer back to two previous alienations with respect to this property made by Lakshmi in 1872 and 1874 under Exs. 1 and 2. The property consisted of land yielding 42 Muras of rice a year and also eight kandies of areca-nuts and 1000 cocoanuts. It is in evidence that on the whole, the income from that property at that time may be about Rs. 280. Ex. 1 was a mortgage with respect of some portion of the property in favour of Thimmanna Bhatta for Rs. 400. It was for discharging "my sundry debts incurred for building my house and for my family expenses". Ex. 2 was an Arwar for 50 years. This related to the entire property and this was in favour of Lakshmi's sister's husband and was for Rupees 1500. The consideration for this document is made up of as follows: (1) Rs. 400 for discharging Ex. 1, then (2) Rs. 635 in settlement of accounts in respect of sums borrowed for the medical treatment of her son Naraina who had been suffering from consumption for about two years, (3) Rs. 197 borrowed for future treatment of the same person, (4) Rs. 268 paid by the mortgagee to one Bhatta who had passed a receipt for the same. This must have been money borrowed by Lakshmi, (5) Payment of maintenance to Aithamma, Rs. 20 per year, and Gangamma at the rate of Rs. 28 per year. This document is attested by the plaintiff's father.

Then we come to Ex. 3, the suit document. Neither Ex. 1 nor Ex. 2 having been discharged, provision had to be made for the discharge of the same by this document. So item 1 of consideration was the payment of Rs. 1100 towards the discharge of Ex. 2, the second payment of Rs. 464 was for discharging Ex. 1. Item 3 consisted of Rs. 800. This was the consideration for the mortgage evidenced by Ex. 5 which we find from the document was executed for the benefit of Lakshmi. Item 4 was Rs. 27-9-7 to be paid by the vendees for assessment. Item 5, Rs. 72, was to pay to Govinda Bhatta for money borrowed by Lakshmi. Item 6 was a sum of Rs. 600 odd, received in cash for stamps, etc., for personal debts and for necessities. By item 7, the vendees agreed to pay Aithamma Rs. 67 per annum for her maintenance till her death as she, by that time, got a decree for that sum and a sum of Rs. 28 was agreed to be paid for maintenance to Gangamma till her death. This obligation was discharged by an actual payment of two sums of Rs. 500 to the two widows at the time of the execution of this document. Thus it may be said that the total consideration for Ex. 3 was Rs. 4000 which the learned Judge says, is not inadequate for the property. The plaintiffs' father, the then nearest male reversioner joined Lakshmi in executing this document. It is this document that is now called into question by the appellants.

It is argued generally that the consideration for the document is not binding, that Exs. 1 and 2 were executed by Lakshmi as the owner of the property which she was not and therefore these are not binding on the estate, that Lakshmi has no power to execute the same and that no satisfactory and sufficient proof of necessity for executing the document has been made out. It is said that when Lakshmi got into possession of the property on the death of her husband, the property remained intact and unencumbered and within five years, it had vanished by these transactions. It is, therefore, stated that the dealings cannot in any way bind the reversioners. On the other hand, it is argued by the respondents that there is sufficient necessity to support the document that the consideration is binding on the estate and the general circumstances would also show that the transaction cannot be questioned at this distance of time. Before we examine the actual binding character of the considerations, we may point out certain general features of the case which will be useful in appreciating the arguments advanced before us. We have already stated that full consideration for the document has been paid. The document is a very ancient one. The suit was filed in 1923. Lakshmi is said to have died in or about 1913. From the evidence, it becomes clear that plaintiff 1 attained his majority in or about the year 1887. He could have instituted a suit for declaration that the alienation was not binding on him some time between 1887 and 1890. That has not been done in this case. If that had been done, the defendants would have been able to produce better and clearer evidence, with regard to the necessity before the lower Court. The father of defendant 1 died in 1919. He was one of the vendees of the properties. Though the plaintiffs failed to institute the suit as mentioned above between 1887 and 1890, plaintiff 1 might well have instituted the suit at least before 1919. If that had been done, the vendee himself could have been asked questions about the nature and the binding character of the transaction and other relevant facts in support of the same.

These circumstances put the present defendants under a serious disadvantage when they are asked to explain the binding character of a document as old as 1875. This further fact also may be mentioned, viz. in Ex. 2, the father of the present plaintiffs was an attestor and the last document, Ex. 3, as stated already, was signed by the plaintiffs' father. He was then the nearest male reversioner. In this connexion, we may refer to the decision of the Privy Council in 42 Mad 523.[1] It says that the consent of the reversioner to an alienation made by the widow is a presumptive proof of necessity. No doubt, this is only a presumption which may be controverted by the plaintiff by other evidence. We may also draw attention to the decision in 44 Cal 186[2] where it has been laid down that recitals in old documents are sufficient proof in support of the deed. In this case, the only evidence in support of necessity consists of the recitals in the document. The document being very old, we have to see whether the recitals therein afford sufficient proof in support of the debt. In 36 M L W 186,[3] it was held by this Court following a series of decisions that where the validity of an alienation made by a Hindu widow of her husband's property came in question a long time after the alienation so that it was impossible to ascertain what were the circumstances in which it was made, presumptions would be permissible to fill in the details which had been obliterated by time and it would be open to the Court to assume that the alienation was made for necessity so as to be valid even though the deed of alienation did not contain recitals of such necessity. Bearing these general features of the case in mind, we will proceed now to examine the evidence that this document affords with regard to necessity.

Exhibit 1 was executed to discharge sundry debts contracted by Lakshmi for construction of a house and also for her household expenses. No doubt, the document is executed by Lakshmi as the owner of the property but taking the document as a whole, it is clear that she is not asserting any right of hers, adverse to her son's rights. Her son was quite an infant at that time and she was looking after the property. Much therefore cannot be said with respect to the statement that it was her property. The question we have to consider is not whether Ex. 1 is enforceable but whether the consideration mentioned in it, the debts were justifiable debts contracted by Lakshmi and whether those debts would be binding on the estate. If those debts were incurred by Lakshmi on behalf of her son, then, no exception can be taken to the binding character of the document. It has not been argued or even suggested that Lakshmi was leading an extravagant or a bad life. Her son was living with her and she was looking after him. The household expenses referred to in the document may well be taken to be expenses of the house which she kept for her benefit as well as for the benefit of her son. She certainly was entitled to maintenance from the estate as the widow of the last male holder. The construction of the house referred to may be taken to be that of a house constructed for being enjoyed by her son. In these circumstances, we do not think that there are any reasonable grounds to suspect the genuine and the binding nature of the recitals.

We now come to Ex. 2. The first item of consideration was for discharge of Ex. 1. The sum of Rs. 635 was in settlement of accounts in respect of sums borrowed for medical treatment of her son. This is certainly binding on the estate and Rs. 197 was borrowed for the future treatment of her son. This also falls into the same category. The next item is Rs. 263; it is said that the mortgagee was paid the money and he has passed a receipt for it but the receipt is not before the Court. There is no evidence to show that Lakshmi was incurring personal debts for private purposes. This sum may be taken to be mainly borrowed for binding purposes and for the benefit of her son or of herself as a member of the household. The next item relates to the payments of maintenance. The binding nature of these payments of maintenance to Aithamma and Gangamma cannot be questioned, and as we have already pointed out the father of the present plaintiffs was an attestor to this document. Next, we come to Ex. 3. The first two items refer to the discharge of Exs. 1 and 2, which had not been discharged. Item 3 is a consideration for a mortgage evidenced by Ex. 5 executed for the benefit of Lakshmi. The learned Subordinate Judge in para. 42 of his judgment says that:

> He is inclined to believe that this amount was given to her by way of making a provision for her maintenance. It is in evidence that Lakshmi ever after lived with her sister's husband and his sons and died while living with one of the latter.

As no other provision has been made for her, we may well agree with the Judge, that this amount was intended for her maintenance and if so, the validity and the binding character of it cannot be questioned. The sum of Rs. 29 was intended for paying assessment and the amount of Rs. 72 was to pay money borrowed by Lakshmi. Then, as we have already pointed out, two other items relate to maintenance, and these were commuted into a single money payment. The sum of Rs. 600-6-5 was for stamps, etc. Thus after an examination of the various items in detail as shown by the recitals, we are not satisfied that there is anything to show that these items of consideration are not binding on the estate. Though the estate had disappeared within about five years, we are not satisfied that the disappearance of it was brought about by the questionable management of the same by Lakshmi. She had to spend money for medical expenses on account of her son and she had also to conduct two litigations which we have not referred to till now. These suits were brought against her for maintenance. One was by Aithamma, the suit by which she obtained a decree for Rs. 67. The other suit by Gangamma did not proceed to its end but was compromised before the decree. This lady had also to meet the funeral expenses of her husband. The argument that she, being a young widow who was only about 27 years old at that time, probably was not able to manage the estate efficiently and that the estate was not therefore productive of full income is not also without force.

Taking all the above circumstances into consideration, we cannot say that the conclusion arrived at by the learned Subordinate Judge that Ex. 3 is a binding transaction is not justified by the evidence. We would, therefore, accept his finding that Ex. 3 is binding. The result is that the plaintiffs' suit is dismissed with costs throughout. As the suit is dismissed on this point, the other questions arising in the case need not be considered.

Appeal No. 243 of 1932, Decided on 21st September 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Nilgiris, Ootacamund, in O. S. No. 43 of 1931.

Contract — Penalty — Owner of land selling mining rights over it — Covenant in sale deed providing that in case of default by vendor to pay assessment on land vendee by paying it should be absolute owner of property — Covenant held amounted to penalty and should be relieved against.

An owner of land sold mining rights over it. A covenant in the sale deed provided that the vendor should pay the assessment on the land and in case he committed default in any year the vendee or his heirs would on payment to Government of such land assessment be entitled to hold and possess with full and absolute rights the property in respect of which such payment had been made. The vendor committed default in payment of land assessment and the vendee on payment of the same brought a suit for declaration that he was an absolute owner of the property :

Held that the covenant was more or less a clause in terorrem and in the nature of a penalty which was out of proportion to the possible injury which the vendee might have suffered by reason of the non-payment of assessment. The covenant therefore should be relieved against. [P 305 C 1]

Venkataramana Rao J. — This is an appeal from the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge of the Nilgiris, Ootacamund giving a decree in favour of the plaintiff in terms of Para. 22 (a) of the plaint. The property belonged to one Percy Guard.

On 1st March 1901 he granted the mining rights in the suit property to one Walter Morres. Subsequently he sold all the mining rights to the plaintiff by a deed dated 1st June 1914. By a release deed of even date Walter Morres surrendered all his mining rights in favour of the plaintiff. The document executed by Percy Guard in favour of the plaintiff is Ex. A in the case. Percy Guard died somewhere about 1916 and letters of administration to his estate were granted to Walter Morres in 1917. As administrator he sold the property to the East India Tea and Produce Co. Ltd. which has since gone into liquidation and the rights of the East India Tea and Produce Co. Ltd. are now vested in the present defendants they having purchased the same in 1923.

One of the terms of Ex. A is that the owner of the property for the time being should pay the assessment on the land and that in case he commits default in any year the vendee, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns will on payment to Government of such land assessment be entitled to hold and possess with full and absolute rights the property in respect of which such payment has been made. On 10th March 1918 there was default committed in the payment of land assessment. On 11th March 1918 the plaintiff wrote to the Tahsildar to find out if the assessment had been paid and on receiving information from him that it had not been paid himself sent the amount on 13th March 1918. A week thereafter (21st March 1918) the defendants also sent the amount of assessment but the revenue authorities declined to receive the said amount on the ground that it had already been received from the plaintiff. Subsequent to this payment, an order was made transferring the patta in the name of the plaintiff but later on representation made on behalf of the administrator the order were cancelled. Again under Ex. A the vendor for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns covenanted that he would do all such acts as may be required of him which are necessary for the purpose of getting the mining license in order to enable the plaintiff to carry on mining operations. This the defendants failed to do. Misunderstandings arose in consequence thereof. The ground of the misunderstanding seems to be that the Government insisted on the defendants making an initial deposit of Rs. 500 and executing an indemnity against all losses that may result in consequence of the mining operations that will be carried on by the plaintiff. The defendants seem to have called upon the plaintiff to make the said deposit and to execute the indemnity bond but the plaintiff declined. As a result of these misunderstandings, the plaintiff filed this suit for a declaration that by reason of the default committed by the defendants in the payment of land assessment under the terms of Ex. A he has become the absolute owner of the suit property on payment by him of the land assessment on 13th March 1918 as aforesaid or in the alternative to direct the defendants to do all the necessary acts which are incumbent upon them to do to get the mining license and that he should not be called upon to pay the initial deposit or execute the indemnity bond.

The learned Subordinate Judge gave a declaration in favour of the plaintiff as prayed for on the ground that he had become the absolute owner by virtue of the covenant in Ex. A. It is against the said decision that the present appeal has been preferred by the defendants. It seems to us that the covenant in and by which the plaintiff should become the absolute owner of 200 acres of land by reason of any default in the payment of land assessment committed by the vendor or his executors, administrators and assigns appears to be more or less a clause in terrorem and in the nature of a penalty which is out of proportion to the possible injury which the plaintiff might suffer by reason of the non-payment. At the same time it must also be noted that the defendants were under the terms of the sale deed Ex. A bound to perform all that was required of them to get the mining license in favour of the plaintiff and that they were not justified in calling upon the plaintiff to pay the initial deposit and to execute the indemnity bond because the Government made a demand upon them. The plaintiff is really anxious that he should be allowed to carry on the mining operations and that the defendants themselves should give him all facilities in order to enable him to do so and he has before us stated that he would be content if those rights are secured in his favour by a decree in the alternative as prayed for in para. 22 (b) of the plaint. It seems to us that the offer is a very reasonable one and it has been agreed to by Mr. O. T. G. Nambiar on behalf of the defendants-appellants.

We therefore set aside the decree of the lower Court and pass a decree in terms of prayer (b) of para. 22 of the plaint directing the defendants to make the necessary application to the revenue authorities and to do all acts required of them to secure to the plaintiff a proper mining lease to carry on mining operations on the suit lands. We also wish to make it clear that the plaintiff will not be called upon by the defendants to pay the initial deposit or execute any indemnity bond, a condition of the defendants securing the lease for the plaintiff. We direct the appellants to pay half the costs of the appeal to the respondent. The order as to costs made by the Court below will stand. The decree will also direct the appellants-defendants to pay the respondent plaintiff Rs. 292 being the assessment paid by the plaintiff in respect of the suit property.

Appeal No. 242 of 1932, Decided on 13th September 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, Cuddapah, in O. S. No. 24 of 1929.

High way—Right of community to use public street for procession with music — Order excepting music during hours of public congregational worship of Muslims is proper, if exception is confined to particular neighbourhood of mosque.

Any community can use a public street for processions attended with music provided that they do not thereby cause a disturbance to any other community when assembled for prayer or worship. [P 306 C 1]

Where therefore in a suit by the Hindus of a village for a declaration of their right to go in procession through public streets attended with music the Court passes an order entitling them to such right except during the hours of public congregational worship in the mosque, the order is proper except that it should limit that exception to the neighbourhood of the mosque prescribing a certain radius with the mosque as the centre inside which there should be no music during such hours of public congregational worship, as to play music when such worship is going on would practically amount to an offence under S. 296, Penal Code, and would certainly be a serious invasion of the Mahomedans' right to engage in public congregational prayer without disturbance: 2 Mad 140; A I R 1925 P C 36 and A I R 1931 All 341, Rel. on. [P 306 C 2]

Pandrang Row J. — This appeal arises out of a dispute between the Mahomedans and Hindus of Muddanur in the Cuddapah District, the Hindus being the plaintiffs who sued for a declaration of their right to carry in procession their idols with the usual accompaniments through the public streets of the village attended with music and also their right to go in procession on occasions of marriage, etc., with music. The suit was one of the usual type that comes to Courts now and then when the two rival communities claim protection from each other and cannot bring themselves to respect each other's feelings. The law is fairly well settled as regards the rights of the different communities in this matter and the rights which the law will recognize and declare have been clearly laid down from 2 Mad 140[1] onwards. It is enough to refer to the decision of the Judicial Committee in 47 All 151[2] and the discussion of the general principles contained in a later Allahabad case, 53 All 484.[3] Generally speaking, the law laid down by this High Court was accepted by the Privy Council as correct.

There is really no dispute about the facts in this case and the rights of the parties are equally not in dispute, for the law is well settled. Any community can use a public street for processions attended with music provided that they do not thereby cause a disturbance to any other community when assembled for prayer or worship. In this connexion, reference may be made to S. 296 and 298, I. P. C. The decree by the Court below, i.e., the District Judge of Cuddapah, is to the following effect :

(1) that the plaintiffs are entitled to carry in procession the idols of their gods and sudibandies and panyaram, carts, etc., through all the public streets of Muddanur attended with music of all kinds on all lawful and customary occasions of feasts or festivals, whether synchronizing with the Muburrum or not, and are entitled also to go in procession on occasions of marriage and other events in the public streets attended with music of all kinds, except during the hours of public congregational worship in the mosque according to the Islamic religion, and subject to any lawful orders or directions by the Magistrates or the police for preventing breaches of the public peace or obstructions of the thoroughfares or for other matters mentioned in S. 144, Criminal P. C. and under other statutory provisions for regulation of traffic ;

(2) that the defendants and other Mahomedans of Muddanur are hereby restrained by means of a permanent injunction from objecting and obstructing or otherwise interfering with the exercise of the abovesaid rights by the plaintiffs and other Hindus of Muddanur.

The appellants who are the Hindu plaintiffs object to the inclusion of the words in the decree, viz. " except during the hours of public congregational worship in the mosque according to the Islamic religion ". They further contend that the exception should be confined only to music in front of the mosque and not anywhere else in any public street. There is a memorandum of cross objections filed by the Mahomedan respondents and their complaint is that congregational worship goes on throughout all hours of the day and night, and that music should be stopped in the front of the mosque at all times and not merely during particular hours. Apparently both parties would prefer the times of the congregational worship to be prescribed in the decree if music is to be prohibited only during the hours of public congregational worship, but there is no evidence in the record of the case which would permit the determination of these hours nor can the parties agree before us as to what the hours are or should be. It is therefore not possible for us to be more particular than the Court below has been in fixing the intervals during which music should not be permitted in the neighbourhood of the mosque.

So far as the objection of the appellants is concerned to the exception introduced in the decree, we are of opinion that the objection taken is not sound, for, it is clear that to play music when public congregational worship is going on in the mosque would practically amount to an offence under S. 296, I. P. C. and would certainly be a serious infraction of the Mahomedans' right to engage in public congregational prayer without disturbance. We therefore think that the learned District Judge was right in introducing the exception, though he should have limited that exception to the neighbourhood of the mosque prescribing a certain radius with the mosque as the centre inside which there should be no music during the hours of public congregational worship in the mosque. As the decree stands, the exception reads as if while public congregational worship is going on in the mosque, no procession with music could go along any public street anywhere. This was obviously not meant by the learned District Judge, and even if he did mean it, there is no justification for prohibiting music everywhere in the village. The complaint of the Mahomedan respondents has no doubt a certain amount of practical common sense behind it in view of the fact that it would not be easy in a village like Muddanur to know exactly when public congregational worship is going on and there might be some difficulty in the way of the police protecting the rights of the one community from attacks by the other community. Nevertheless, though there is something to be said in support of the suggestion of the respondents, viz. to prohibit music in front of the mosque at all times, as a practical solution of the ever-recurring disputes that occur between the two communities, it is not possible to give a judicial imprimatur to such a solution as that would be inconsistent with the law as laid down for very many years. It is therefore impossible in view of the existing state of the law to prohibit music at all times in front of the mosque. Such a suggestion was considered in more than one case and was negatived, and we are unable to give effect to it as the law stands at present. It therefore follows that the only change that has to be made in the decree of the Court below is to make it clear that the exception contained in the decree is limited only to a certain area round the mosque. We consider, in the circumstances, that if the exception is made to operate, "within the area constituted by a circle drawn round the mosque building proper of a radius of 50 yards (the centre of the mosque being treated for this purpose as the mosque)", it would, in all probability, prevent any real disturbance of public congregational worship in the mosque. The words enclosed in the inverted commas in the preceding sentence will therefore be inserted in the decree after the words " the Islamic religion. "

Subject to the above modification in the decree, both the appeal and the memorandum of cross objections are dismissed; in the circumstances of the case, the parties will bear their own costs.

Appeals Nos. 304 of 1934 and 9, 81, 82, 92, 291 and 409 and Civil Revn. Petns. Nos. 328 and 331 of 1935, Decided on 6th October 1937, against order of Dist. Court East Godawari at Rajahmundry, D/- 17th March 1934.

* (a) Stamp Act (1899), Ss. 2 (15), 35, 36 and 37—Decree in suit for partition of joint family directing payment of specific sums to individual members — Payment to be made from joint family fund or out of proceeds of sale of joint property—Decree amounts to final order effecting partition and falls within S. 2 (15) — It cannot be executed by Civil Court unless engrossed on proper non-judicial stamp paper—Fact that decree does not finally divide whole of joint family property is immaterial—Mere fact that decree has been acted upon for over two years does not preclude objection to its executability on ground of want of proper stamp — Decree and proceeding thereunder cannot become validated with retrospective effect on production of proper stamp — Case is governed by S. 35—Ss. 36 and 37 do not apply.

Where a decree in a suit for partition of joint family property directs payment of specific sums to individual members of the joint family, and the payments are to be made out of the joint family funds or out of the proceeds of the sale of the joint family property, the effect of the provisions is that the properties which were joint properties are divided among the members of the joint family and the decree amounts to a final order of a Civil Court for effecting a partition and falls strictly within the terms of S. 2 (15) Stamp Act, and cannot be acted upon i.e. executed by any Civil Court unless it is engrossed on a proper non-judicial stamp paper. The fact that the decree does not finally divide the whole of the joint family property is immaterial, for, a decree may be partly preliminary and partly final. So also, the mere fact that the decree has been acted upon and executed for over two years does not preclude a subsequent objection to its executability on the ground that it has not been properly stamped. The case is governed by S. 35 and not by S. 36, which deals only with the admission of instrument in evidence. [P 311 C 1, 2]

The decree and the proceedings taken thereunder cannot become validated with retrospective effect on the production of the proper non-judicial stamp. S. 37, Stamp Act, does not apply to the case. A final decree for partition has no existence as a decree until it is engrossed on proper non-judicial stamp paper : 32 Cal 483, Rel. on. [P 312 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 47, R. 1 — Court executing decree not deciding point raised by judgment-debtor that decree is not executable for want of engrossment on non-judicial stamp — Omission amounts to "other sufficient cause or reason"—Order of executing Court is open to review.

When a Court executing a decree omits to decide a point raised on behalf of the judgment-debtor that the decree .is not executable for want of engrossement on a non-judicial stamp, the omission amounts to "other sufficient cause or reason" within the meaning of O. 47, R. 1, even if it does not constitute a "mistake or error apparent on the face of the record". The order of the executing Court is open to review, and an order granting a review is not wrong in law. [P 312 C 1]

 (c) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 47, R. 1—Application for review made—Subsequent filing of appeal does not render it incompetent — Application granted during pendency of appeal—Appeal cannot be heard and must be dismissed.

When an application for review has been made the subsequent filing of an appeal will not render the application for review incompetent. But if the application for review is granted during the pendency of the appeal, the appeal cannot be heard and must be dismissed, the order appealed from having been superseded by the order passed after review : 32 Mad 416 (F B) and 28 All 240, Rel. on. [P 312 C 2]

(d) Execution—Validity — Decree in partition suit, in substance, a final order effecting partition - Decree not engrossed on proper non-judicial stamp is not valid — Sale in execution of such decree is nullity and passes no title to auction-purchaser.

Where a decree in a partition suit which is in substance a final order effecting partition is not engrossed on a proper non-judicial stamp, there is no valid decree in existence and the Court has no jurisdiction to sell any property in the execution proceedings. If such a sale takes place, the whole of the sale proceedings are a mere nullity and the sale passes no title to the auction-purchaser. [P 312 C 2]

(e) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 43, R. 1 and S. 115 —Order rejecting auction-purchaser's application for confirmation of sale.

An order rejecting an auction-purchaser's application for confirmation of sale in his favour is not an appealable order nor can it be revised. [P 312 C 2]

(f) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 47 — Decree in partition suit not engrossed on proper non-judicial stamp — Decree-holder applying to executing Court for having decree engrossed on proper stamp—Order of executing Court is not one under S. 47.

Where a decree in a suit for partition is not engrossed on a proper non-judicial stamp paper and the decree-holder applies to the executing Court to have the decree engrossed on a proper non-judicial stamp, an order passed by the Court on the application is not one under S. 47, Civil P. C., and no appeal lies from it. [P 313 C 1]

Burn J.—These appeals and C. R. P. No. 331 of 1935 arise out of orders passed by the learned District Judge of East Godavari and the Principal Subordinate Judge, Ellore, in the course of proceedings taken in execution of the decree in O S. No. 18 of 1928 on the file of the Sub-Court Ellore. The suit was for partition of joint family property, but besides the members of the joint family, many persons were impleaded as defendants on the allegation that they were in possession of joint family properties, moveable and immovable. On 16th September 1930, the Subordinate Judge passed a "preliminary decree", and this was transferred for execution to the District Court of East Godavari. In that Court, three applications for execution were put in by the plaintiff and defendant 5, against defendants 40-43. The first was E. P. No. 151 of 1931 by the plaintiff, presented on 6th October 1931, in which he prayed for arrest of defendants 40-43, and for attachment and sale of their moveable and immovable properties to realize the balance due to the plaintiff under the decree of 16th September 1930 It is clear, though the papers are not before us, that in pursuance of this petition certain moveable and immovable properties were brought to sale, for, on 16th November 1931, defendant 5, (a brother of the plaintiff and defendant 1) presented E. P. No. 167 of 1931 against the same judgment-debtors, praying for attachment and sale of immovable properties, for his rateable share in the proceeds of the sale of the moveable properties attached by the plaintiff in E. P. No. 151, and for the appointment of a Commissioner to collect the entire income from the properties of the judgment-debtors. The third execution petition was E. P. No. 76 of 1934, by defendant 5 against the same judgment-debtors praying for the attachment of a sum of about Rs. 12,000, said to be in deposit in O. S. No. 62 of 1926 on the file of the Sub-Court, Rajahmundry.

The principal question for decision in these appeals is whether the decree of 16th September 1930 was executable, or whether it was a mere decree on paper, which could not be executed because it had not been engrossed on a non-judicial stamp paper. This question was not raised by defendants 40-43 till 14th March 1934, more than two years after the filing of E. Ps. 151 and 167 of 1931. It was then raised in E. A. No. 77 of 1934, an application under S. 47, Civil P. C., in which defendants 40.43 prayed for the dismissal of E. P. No. 151 of 1931 on the ground that there was not in existence a valid and legal decree engrossed on a proper non-judicial stamp paper. The learned District Judge, Mr. P. T. Jagannadhachariar, dismissed this application on 17th March 1934 in a short order:

This application was apparently put in under a misapprehension. What was transmitted to this Court for execution was the preliminary decree dated September 1930 and not the final decree. Execution has been going on from 1931. Petition dismissed.

A. A. O. No. 304 of 1934 is filed by defendants 40, 42 and 43 from this order. Having dismissed E. A. No. 77 of 1934, the District Judge ordered execution to proceed, and certain properties of defendants 40.43 were sold at Court-auction on 17th March 1934. On 6th April 1934, defendants 40 43 presented two petitions to the District Judge, E. A. Nos. 107 and E. A. No. 108 of 1934. In the first, they prayed for restoration to the file of E. A. No. 77 of 1934, and for review of the order passed thereon. In the second they applied under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C., for the setting aside of the sale. By the time these came on for hearing, Mr. P. T. Jagannadhachariar had been succeeded in the office of District Judge by Mr. P. Rajagopalan, I. C. S., who took a very different view. He allowed E. A. No. 107 of 1934 reviewed his predecessor's order and on 6th September 1934 passed an order accepting the contentions of the judgment-debtors. He held that the decree of 16th September 1930 was a final order for partition within the meaning of S. 2 (15) of the Stamp Act. It followed that it could not be acted upon, i. e. executed by by any Civil Court (S. 35 of the Stamp Act). A. A. O. No. 9 of 1935 is filed by the plaintiff from this order. There are thus two appeals by opposing parties from two contradictory orders passed by two District Judges on the same petition.

Without delay the plaintiff went to the Court which had passed the decree, and on 17th September 1934, he applied in E. A. No. 279 of 1934 to the Subordinate Judge, Ellore, for orders on the question whether any and if so what non-judicial stamp was to be paid for by the plaintiff, and for orders to receive from the plaintiff whatever stamp was necessary, and to have the decree engrossed thereon. The Principal Subordinate Judge allowed the plaintiff's request, and directed his office to determine the value of the stamp in a week, allowing the parties in whose favour a decree had been given 15 days time to produce the required non-judicial stamps. A. A. O. No. 81 of 1935 is preferred by defendants 40.43 from this order. The Subordinate Judge's order was obeyed without delay but the learned District Judge of East Godavari held that the engrossing of the decree on the proper stamp paper after 17th September 1934, could not validate any proceedings taken in execution theretofore. Acting on this view, he dismissed E. P. No. 151 of 1931 on 15th November 1934, and A. A. O. No. 291 of 1935 is the plaintiff's appeal from that order of dismissal. For the same reasons the learned District Judge on 30th November 1934 dismissed the two execution petitions of defendant 5, E. P. No 167 of 1931 and E. P. No. 76 of 1934. A. A. O. No. 94 of 1935 and A. A. O. No. 409 of 1935 are defendant 5's appeals from those orders. The last petition with which we have to do is E. A. No. 293 of 1934 presented on 19th November 1934, by a purchaser at the auction held on 17th March 1934 of some of the properties of the judgment-debtors. He brought to the notice of the Court that the decree had by that time been engrossed on a non-judicial stamp. He requested the District Judge to hold that the decree had thereby been validated with retrospective effect, and accordingly to confirm the sale in his favour. The District Judge disposed of this petition and I. A. No. 108 of 1934, (the judgment-debtor's application under O. 21, R. 90), in one order on 27th November 1934. He directed that both should be "struck off the file" on the ground that E. P. No. 151 of 1931 had been dismissed. This dismissal, the learned District Judge held, rendered E. A. No. 108 of 1934, superfluous, and made it impossible to comply with E. A. No. 293 of 1934. From the order striking off E. A. No. 293 of 1934, the auction-purchaser has preferred A. A. O. No. 82 of 1935; he has also, in C. R. P. No. 331 of 1935, prayed that the order of the District Judge may be revised under S. 115, Civil P. C.

Several interesting questions arise for decision, of which the most important, as already observed, is what is the nature of the decree passed in O. S. No. 18 of 1928 on 16th September 1930. Mr. Jagannadhachariar, without apparently giving the matter much consideration, remarked that it was the preliminary decree and not the final decree. How a mere preliminary decree in a suit for partition could be executable, he did not explain; he seems to have been satisfied that it could, because execution had been going on for over two years. Mr. Rajagopalan, on the other hand, held that the decree, though it styles itself as a preliminary decree, was a final order for effecting a partition within the meaning of S. 2 (15), Stamp Act. Mr. Suryanarayana, who appears in these appeals for the plaintiff, and Mr. Kameswara Rao, who appears for defendant 5, also for the auction-purchaser, contend that in so far as it is a decree for partition, it is only a preliminary decree. They would say that it is only a final decree in so far as it decides the liabilities of the debtors of the joint family to the joint family. According to this view, the executing Court was not asked to act upon the decree in its character of a decree for partition, but merely in its character of a decree for payment of money to the family. Mr. Somayya, who appears for defendants 40.43, supports the decision of Mr. Rajagopalan. It is necessary at this point to examine the decree, and in particular those portions of it which the plaintiff and defendant 5 have attempted to execute. The decree begins with an order that certain immovable properties be divided into four equal shares, and that the plaintiff, defendant 1, defendant 10, and defendant 11, do each get possession of one such share. It goes on to give directions regarding the manner in which the partition of those properties shall be made and the various members of the family to whom certain items shall be allotted. It then declares that certain questions between the members of the family and some defendants who were occupying lands belonging to the family, and certain questions between the members of the family inter se, shall be reserved for decision in separate suits. Next, the decree directs certain payments to be made to the plaintiff by other members of the family, defendants 1-5. Then we come to the terms with which these appeals are concerned, viz. the clauses directing defendants 40.43 to pay certain sums to the plaintiff, defendant 1 and defendant 5, after deducting certain sums due to them from the plaintiff and defendant 1. It will be convenient to set out these clauses of the decree in full. They are as follows:

(13) That the plaintiff and defendant 1 do each get from defendants 40-43 half of Rs. 1,30,493, being the sum shown as balance in the three names katha, and interest thereon from 14th February 1926, and that the plaintiff and defendant 1 do each get from defendants 40.43 half of Rs. 31,895-11-7, being the balance under No. 2 Venkayya katha and interest thereon from 6th October 1925.

(14) That plaintiff, defendant 1 and defendant 5 do each get from defendants 40.43 one-third of Rs. 43,145-4-9, being the sum shown as balance in Sesha Rao's katha and interest thereon from 31st March 1925.

(15) That defendants 40.43 do deliver to each of plaintiff and defendant 1 half of the timber shown as balance under No. 2 Venkayya katha or their value, Rs. 6730, and interest thereon from 25th February 1925.

(19) That defendants 40.43 do recover from plaintiff Rs. 87,910-7-10, being the amount of debt payable by him under No. 1 Venkayya katha, and interest thereon from 14th March 1926.

(20) That defendants 40.43 do recover from defendant 1 personally and from the family properties of defendants 2 to 4, the sum of Rs. 98,777-2-10, being the balance of debts still payable under No. 1 Venkayya katha, after deduction of the sum payable by plaintiff as per para. 19 supra, and interest on the said sum of Rupees 98,777-2-10 from 14th March 1926.

(21) (This clause provides for interest on the sums due to the plaintiff, defendants 1, 5, and 40.43.)

(22) That defendants 40.43, do deposit into Court or pay plaintiff and defendant 1 and defendant 5 the sums due to each of them under the three names katha, No. 2 Venkayya katha and Sesha Rao's katha, after deducting what is due to them from plaintiff and defendant 1 respectively with reference to No. 1 Venkayya katha.

The remaining clauses are concerned with the appointment of a Commissioner to determine the amounts due to the several parties under clauses 9(a) to 9(d), 10(a) to 10(d), 12(a) to 12(c) and 16 to 18, with directions to the Commissioner, the remuneration of the Receivers and the Commissioner, and the court-fees payable to Government. It is clear that the clauses of the decree extracted above are on the face of them executable provisions. It is also clear that they are not directions for payments to be made by strangers to the joint family as a whole. They are directions for the payment of the specific sums to individual members of the joint family. And there is no gainsaying the statement of defendants 40-43 that these payments are to be made out of moneys that were before the suit joint family property, or out of the proceeds of the sale of joint family property. The effect of these provisions in the decree therefore is that properties which were joint properties are divided amongst the members of the family who were the co-owners. There is nothing more that the Court which tried the suit can do to divide these joint properties. The learned District Judge (Mr. Rajagopalan) was undoubtedly justified in relying on the decision of Bakewell J. in 35 Mad 26,[1] where the distinction between a preliminary and a final order for partition is explained. The learned advocates for the plaintiff, defendant 5 and the auction-purchaser have not been able to adduce any arguments or authorities to show that the learned District Judge was wrong. We agree with his conclusion that the decree in this case is a final order of a Civil Court for effecting a partition, and that it falls strictly within the terms of S. 2 (15), Stamp Act. That the decree does not finally divide the whole of the joint family property is quite immaterial. As the learned District Judge has observed, the Explanation to the definition of "decree" in S. 2 (2), Civil P. C., shows that a decree may be partly preliminary and partly final. It is not necessary to cite authority for this, or to refer to cases in which this distinction has been acted upon.

The next question discussed by Mr. Suryanarayana for the plaintiff has reference to S. 36, Stamp Act. He contends and Mr. Kameswara Rao supports him on behalf of defendant 5 and the auction-purchaser, that it is now too late for defendants 40-43 to object to the execution of the decree. Even if it be held, as we do hold, that the decree of 16th September 1930 was an instrument of partition and as such not executable unless engrossed on a non-judicial stamp of the proper value, the decree was in fact acted upon and executed for over two years, and S. 36, Stamp Act, it is contended, precludes any subsequent objection to its execution on the ground that it has not been properly stamped. This contention, we are satisfied, is baseless. S. 36 deals only with the admission of instruments in evidence. There is no question here of admitting the decree of 16th September 1930 in evidence; the question is one of executing the decree. The provision applicable is S. 35, Stamp Act, which provides that:

> No instrument chargeable with duty shall be . . . . acted upon . . . . by any public officer, unless such instrument is duly stamped.

For our present purpose, the important words in the section are "acted upon." The only way in which a decree of this kind can be acted upon is by execution. The District Court of East Godavari did not admit the decree in evidence; it was never asked to admit it in evidence. What the plaintiff and defendant 5 wanted was that it should be put in execution, i. e. of acted upon, and that was what the District Court did until Mr. Rajagopalan pointed out that it could not be done.

Another contention put forward on behalf of the plaintiff, defendant 5 and the auction-purchaser is that when the Principal Subordinate Judge of Ellore on 5th October 1934 directed the proper non-judicial stamp to be produced, and had the decree engrossed thereon, the decree became validated with retrospective effect from the date on which it had been passed. Consequently, it is urged, all the proceedings taken in execution of the decree also became validated. This contention also is devoid of substance. S. 37, Stamp Act, is invoked, but it obviously has no application; this is not a case in which an instrument has been written on a stamp of sufficient amount but of improper description. There is no provision of law which could validate this decree with retrospective effect. As Mr. Somayya points out, S. 42 (2), Stamp Act, merely provides that when the duty leviable upon an unstamped or insufficiently stamped instrument has been paid, and the instrument has been endorsed, the instrument shall thereupon be admissible in evidence.

1. Thiruvengadathan Aiya v. Mangayya, (1912) 35 Mad 26=12 I C 775.

and may be acted upon. In terms this provision is not retrospective. It is well settled that a final decree for partition has no existence as a decree until it is engrossed on the proper non-judicial stamp paper; till that is done the suit is pending: vide 32 Cal 483.[2]

A subsidiary point taken in A. A. O. No. 9 of 1935 is that the District Judge, Mr. Rajagopalan, had no jurisdiction to review his predecessor's order dated 17th March 1934 on E. A. No 77 of 1934; or, if he had jurisdiction, his order granting review was contrary to law. The first contention is apparently based on R 2, O. 47, Civil P. C. but it cannot be upheld; the application of review was made to Mr. Jagannadhachariar and notice of it was given by him. There has been no appeal from Mr. Rajagopalan's order granting a review. That does not by itself preclude Mr. Suryanarayana from showing that it is wrong in his appeal from the final order passed after the review was granted: vide R. 7, O. 47. But Mr. Suryanarayana has not attempted in argument to show exactly why he contends that Mr. Rajagopalan had no jurisdiction, nor why his order was illegal From the unofficial typewritten copies produced by Mr Suryanarayana at the time of hearing, it would seem that Mr. Rajagopalan granted the review because his predecessor had not decided the only point of importance put forward by the petitioners in E. A. No. 77 of 1934. The point raised was that the decree was not executable for want of engrossment on a non-judicial stamp Mr. Jagannadhachariar did not say a word about this in his order of 17th March 1934. This omission would clearly amount to "other sufficient reason" under R. 1, O. 47, even if it did not constitute a "mistake or error apparent on the face of the record." It is therefore impossible for us to hold either that Mr. Rajagopalan had no jurisdiction, or that his order granting a review was wrong in law.

Mr. Somayya, for the 40.43 judgment-debtors, contended that it was a matter of little or no importance, whether Mr. Rajagopalan had or had not jurisdiction to review his predecessor's order in view of the fact that his clients had preferred an appeal (A. A. O. No. 304 of 1934) from the order which was reviewed. The application for review of Mr. Jagannadhachariar's order of 17th March 1934 was filed on 6th April 1934; the appeal from the same order was presented in this Court on 16th July 1934. Now it is well settled that when an application for review has been made, the subsequent filing of an appeal will not render the application for review incompetent: see 32 Mad 416.[3] But, if the application for review is granted during the pendency of the appeal, the appeal cannot be heard and must be dismissed. The reason is obvious; the order appealed from has been superseded by the order passed after review: 28 All 240.[4] It remains to dispose of the contentions of the auction-purchaser (appellant in A. A. O. No. 82 of 1935). Mr. Kameswara Rao argues that the auction-purchaser, having bought at the sale held by the Court, with no reason to suppose that there was anything lacking in the Court's power to sell, and having paid value, must be protected. He relies on the Privy Council cases reported in 14 Cal 18[5] and 25 Bom 337.[6] Those cases have no application to this. In both, it is clear that the executing Court had jurisdiction to sell. Here the whole point is that there was no decree in existence at the time of sale, and that consequently the whole of the sale proceedings was a mere nullity. There is therefore on the merits nothing in A. A. O. No. 82 of 1935 and C. R. P. No. 331 of 1935. Technically also the appeal and the C. R. P. are incompetent. There is no provision in the Code of Civil Procedure for an application by the auction-purchaser for confirmation of the sale; confirmation follows automatically under R. 92 (1) and the setting aside of the sale follows automatically, under R. 92 (2) of O. 21. An order rejecting an auction-purchaser's application for confirmation of the sale is not an appealable matter, nor can it be revised. It is very unfortunate for the purchaser that he should have been misled by the action of the Court into paying down his money, and leaving it lying idle for such a long period, but it is quite impossible to confirm the sale in his favour.

A. A. O. No. 18 of 1935 is clearly incompetent. The application, E. A. No 279 of 1934, to the Subordinate Judge of Ellore, was a mere reminder to the Court to do a duty incumbent on the Court, viz. to see that the decree was engrossed on a proper non-judicial stamp. This has nothing to do with the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree, and the Subordinate Judge's order is not one under S. 47, Civil P. C. The learned Subordinate Judge has made a somewhat obscure reference to the doctrine of "nunc pro tunc" which we do not altogether understand. If he meant to imply that the decree after engrossment on the proper stamp could or would become validated with effect from the date, 16th September 1930, he was clearly wrong. We have already indicated that the decree only came into existence as a decree on the date on which it was engrossed. The learned District Judge (Mr. Rajagopalan) was wrong in holding that E. P. No. 151 of 1931 "must be deemed to have been dismissed on 6th September 1934." The E. P. was not before the learned District Judge on 6th September 1934 when he disposed of E. A. No. 77 of 1934. Actually, the learned District Judge dismissed E. P. No. 151 of 1931 on 15th November 1934 as appears from the concluding sentence of his judgment, and from the decretal order passed in pursuance of it. This order is correct, if based upon the view that the decree which was to be executed was the decree engrossed on a non-judicial stamp, no copy whereof had been produced before, or transmitted to the District Judge, East Godavari. It would be incorrect if based on the ground that E. P. No. 151 of 1931 must be deemed to have been dismissed on 6th September 1934, but we must decline to interfere with it, since it is quite possible to read the learned District Judge's judgment as basing it on the proper ground, viz. that a certified copy of the decree had not been produced (vide O. 21, R. 11 (3), Civil P. C.).

We proceed to pass orders on the matters before us in the light of these conclusions. A. A. O. No. 304 of 1934 is dismissed with the costs of respondent 1 (plaintiff.) A. A. O. No. 9 of 1935 is dismissed; we make no order as to costs, because the respondents were unduly dilatory in raising the contention that the decree could not be executed. A. A. O. No. 81 of 1935 is dismissed with costs. C. R. P. 328 of 1935 also is dismissed. A. A. O. No. 291, 94 and 409 of 1935 are dismissed; as in A. A. O. No. 9 of 1935 we make no order as to costs. A. A. O. No. 82 of 1935 and C. R. P. No. 331 of 1935 are dismissed. The parties will pay their own costs in these.

Order. — In exceptional circumstances, it has been laid down, an infant plaintiff can be called on to furnish security for costs: 18 M L J 155.[1] In the case of a pauper appellant again, it has been uniformly held in this province (though a different view prevails in the other Courts) that if special grounds are shown, he can be required to find security: 3 Mad 66[2], 43 Mad 902,[3] 56 Mad 323[4] and 1931 M W N 1157.[5] Thus the fact that the appellant here is both a minor and a pauper, does not by itself entitle him to resist the application. In this case the effect of Burn J.'s order is that the minor pauper is a mere creature in the hands of persons well able to find security. This being so, the learned Judge's order is confirmed and the Letters Patent appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 276 of 1932, Decided on 6th October 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, Chittoor, in O. S. No. 3 of 1929.

Hindu Law—Religious endowment — Gift to temple — Properties conveyed to person described by donor as trustee—No other persons in management as general trustees—Object of gift connected with ordinary worship in temple — Such trustee is not special trustee.

It is only in a case where there are other persons in management who can be regarded as general trustees and there are other funds out of which the general upkeep of the trust can be carried on that there will be any sense in distinguishing any endowment as a special trust or kattalai intended for a particular purpose.

S. A. Seshadri Ayyangar — for Appellant.

Varadachariar J.—This appeal arises out of a suit under S. 73, Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act, for the framing of a scheme in respect of the administration of two village temples and for incidental reliefs relating thereto. The plaint also prayed for the removal of the defendant from trusteeship, and for vesting certain properties in the plaintiff as trustee. Certain sums of money were also claimed as due from the defendant to the institution. The learned Judge dismissed the defendant from the trusteeship and allowed a small portion of the money claimed, but dismissed the suit so far as it claimed relief in respect of the lands forming item 1 in Sch. B to the plaint on the ground that those lands had been constituted a special trust and that the Court acting under S. 73, Endowments Act, had no jurisdiction to award any relief in respect thereof. In this appeal by the plaintiff nearly all the reliefs disallowed by the lower Court were claimed in the memo of appeal but during the arguments before us nearly all the money claims have been given up, it being stated that in the present condition of the defendant, nothing could be got out of him as a result of any money decree that may be passed against him. Only one portion of the money claim was pressed, namely that relating to a sum of Rs. 250 which it was stated constituted part of the trust funds realized by the defendant as per the razinamah decree in O. S. No. 85 of 1921 in his family and was traceable as part of the consideration for Ex. L, a mortgage taken by the defendant in 1926. We agree with the learned Judge that it is not possible on the terms of Ex. P, the razinamah decree, to say what items of property were allotted to the suit temples as distinguished from the chatram charity at Tiruttani. It is not denied that Ex. I is restricted to the immovable properties and makes no reference to the moneys which it is said were also constituted endowments to the temple in Ex. P. Further, even assuming Ex. Q to be genuine, it is impossible to say that the money said to have been received by the defendant under Ex. Q could have formed the advance to Rama Reddi which is referred to in Ex. L, because that advance is said to have been made on 10th May 1921 whereas Ex. Q is dated 12th May 1924. We are therefore unable to hold that the suit temples can claim any portion of the moneys forming the consideration for Ex. L, as part of the trust funds of the temple.

As regards the immovable properties forming item 1 of the B schedule to the plaint, we regret we are unable to agree with the view taken by the lower Court. The language of Ex. I, the deed of endowment, is clear enough even as it is; and if it is read in the light of Ex. P, there is no room for doubt as to what was intended. Ex. P contemplates these lands being set apart for the temple. Ex. I as originally worded also ran as a gift of these properties to the temple. A line was however interpolated before the completion of the document describing the defendant as trustee of the temples. We do not see that these interpolated words in any manner alter the scope or effect of the document. It appears from the evidence that the temples in the village were just then in the process of renovation and it is not suggested that there were any other trustees who may be described as 'general' trustees of the temple if one would take Ex. I to constitute the defendant special trustee, as the learned Judge in the Court below held him to be. The learned Judge says that the defendant could not have been appointed a trustee of the temple by the donors under Ex. I because they could not have had any such power under the law. That seems to us beside the point; whether the said appointment by the donors would be valid in law or not, it is obvious that it is in the capacity of a trustee of the suit temples that the donor conveyed the property to the defendant. Whether he was a trustee de facto or de jure, having taken the property under such a gift deed he cannot claim to have held the properties in any character except that of the trustee of the temples. Further, there is no basis for any argument on this gift deed, having regard to the terms of Ex. I, that any special purpose was contemplated. The purposes specified in the document are purposes connected with the ordinary worship in the temple, namely maintenance of the gurukkal, putting up lights and the performance of festivals. It is only in a case where there are other persons in management who can be regarded as general trustees and there are other funds out of which the general upkeep of the trust can be carried on that there will be any sense in distinguishing any endowment as a special trust or kattalai intended for a particular purpose. There is no room for any such differentiation in the present case. We must accordingly hold that the lands specified as item I to Sch. B, in the plaint constitute an endowment to the temple and we make a declaration accordingly. For the time being, the properties will be vested in the plaintiff as the only existing trustee, the defendant having been removed. In view however of the observations of the learned District Judge as to the way the plaintiff himself has been carrying on the management of the temple, it will be for the authorities concerned and for persons interested in the temple to take proper steps to ensure that the institution is duly managed.

The learned District Judge found that if defendant is to be held accountable for mesne profits in respect of the lands above referred to, a sum of Rs. 400 will be the proper estimate for the years prior to suit. He has not given any declaration even in respect of that amount because of his view that these properties could not be held to be an 'endowment' to the temple. In the view that we have above expressed, there will be a declaration that the defendant is accountable to the temple in respect of the above sum of Rs. 400, and for any other amounts which the Court may on enquiry fix to be properly payable as profits from these lands for the period subsequent to the institution of the suit and before the defendant ceased to be a trustee under the decree of the lower Court. We agree with the lower Court that having regard to the character of the institution it is scarcely worth while to frame a scheme; but if it is not possible to rectify the management in any other manner, it will be time enough to consider whether a scheme may not be necessary. To the extent above indicated, the decree of the lower Court will be varied and the case sent back to the lower Court for further inquiries and directions. As the appeal has succeeded only in part, there will be no order as to costs of this appeal.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 7, R. 11 (c)—Provision in O. 7, R. 11 (c) does not apply to appeals.

The provisions in O. 7, R. 11 (c) do not apply to appeals. The Appellate Court is entitled to reject an appeal in which the full court-fees have not been paid without calling upon the appellant to pay the deficient court-fee. So far as memoranda of appeals are concerned, express provision is made in O. 41, R. 3 for their rejection on grounds stated in that rule : A I R 1915 Mad 426 ; A I R 1934 Cal 659 ; A I R 1920 Lah 92 ; A I R 1917 Pat 26 and A I R 1929 All 75, Rel. on. [P 316 C 2 ; P 317 C 1]

A mere filing of a paper without the proper court-fee does not amount to a proper presentation of appeal for all purposes. P. Satyanarayana Rao and V. Parthasarathy — for Appellants.

Ch. Raghava Rao and S. Rajaraman — for Respondents.

Varadachariar J.—This case though numbered as an appeal comes up before us for disposal on the question whether the appeal is to be treated as having been presented in time or should be dismissed as not having been presented in time. The memorandum of appeal was filed in this Court on 21st March 1935 which was within the time allowed by law, but it was presented on a court-fee of Rs. 5 while in the valuation memo attached to the memorandum it was stated that Rupees 224.15.0 was the court-fee payable. The papers were returned on more than one occasion to the party for various purposes and on 15th July 1935 the appellant's counsel revised the memo of valuation with the result that Rs. 111.5.0 was shown as the court-fee payable. Even this amount was not paid for a long time and the appellants ultimately filed an application under S. 149, Civil P. C. (C. M. P. No. 327 of 1936) for extension of time to pay deficient court-fee. This application was rejected by one of us on the ground that the reasons assigned in support of the application for extension of time were palpably false and the appellants had no other reason for non-payment of the court-fee in time than their inability to find the money. The case was then directed to be posted for argument on the question whether in view of the fact that the deficient court-fee was paid long after the expiry of the period of limitation the appeal should not be dismissed as not presented in time. Notice was given to the respondent to be present at the argument of this question, so that the decision on the point may be final between the parties.

It has now been contended before us that in spite of the dismissal of the application under S. 149, Civil P. C. the memorandum of appeal cannot be held not to have been presented in time because on the analogy of the provisions of O. 7, R. 11 (in the case of plaints) the appellants ought to have been called upon within a fixed period to pay the deficient court-fee and until that has been done it is not open to the Court to reject the appeal. This argument seems to us to ignore the real point for consideration. We may however mention in passing that the applicability of the provision in O. 7, R. 11 (c), Civil P. C. to appeals is by no means so clear as the learned counsel for the appellants assumes. On the other hand, the weight of authority is decidedly against its applicability. Except the Bombay High Court, nearly all the other High Courts have held that the provision in O. 7, R. 11, Cl. (c), does not apply to appeals. In this Court that view was expressed as early as in 27 M L J 677[1] and quite recently the Calcutta High Court has expressed the same view in 61 Cal 663.[2] See also 1 Lah 234,[3] 3 Pat L J 74[4] and 50 All 980.[5] There are obvious reasons for drawing a distinction in this respect between plaints and memoranda of appeal. In the case of a plaint, there is no power in the Court to excuse delay on grounds which are available under S. 5, Lim. Act, in the case of appeals. Other cases of possible hardship are sufficiently provided for by the discretion vested in the Court under S. 149 of the Code. So far as memoranda of appeal are concerned, express provision is made in O. 41, R. 3 for their rejection on grounds specified in that Rule. But as we have indicated already, the question now is not one relating to the rejection of the memorandum of appeal but a point of limitation.

In view of the provisions of S. 4, Court-fees Act, it cannot be said that a mere filing of a paper without the proper court-fee amounts to a proper presentation of the appeal for all purposes. The observations in 40 Mad 687[6] must be read in the light of the facts of the case where the Court was dealing with a pauper petition and the court-fee had been paid within the time fixed after the dismissal of the pauper petition. The language of S. 149, Civil P. C. itself seems to imply that in the absence of an order granting time under that section, presentation of the unstamped or insufficiently stamped memorandum of appeal will not amount to a valid presentation. The concluding words of S. 149 provide that where proper court-fee is paid in terms of an order under S. 149, the document in respect of which such fee is payable shall have the same force and effect as if such fee had been paid in the first instance. The application under S. 149 having been dismissed in this case, it is impossible to maintain that the appeal has been presented in time. We see no reason to excuse the delay because the considerations urged in the order on C. M. P. No. 327 of 1936 are equally applicable to this aspect of the matter. The result is that this appeal must be dismissed as not presented in time. The respondent will be entitled to costs as on an application to excuse delay.

 Civil P. C. (1908), S. 65—Execution Sale—Lessee of judgment-debtor paying rent to judgment-debtor before confirmation of sale—Suit by auction purchaser against judgment-debtor and lessee to recover such rent—Lessee held was protected.

The execution sale was not made absolute until after the payment of the rent had been made by the lessee to the judgment-debtor who was, until the sale was confirmed, his landlord. The auction-purchaser after confirmation brought a suit against the judgment-debtor and lessee to recover the rent so paid :

Held that the payment of the rent by the lessee to the judgment-debtor was quite proper and he was entitled to do so, in spite of the fact that there was the fiction of relation back of the vesting. The lessee was protected until such time as the sale was confirmed in regard to any payment he had made to the judgment-debtor and therefore no decree could be passed against him: A I R 1933 P C 101, Ref. [P 318 C 2]

Order. — The plaintiff in this suit although ordered to be served with notice on the former occasion of this petition has not appeared and therefore I have heard an ex party argument. If there was any argument to be advanced on his side, it is his own fault that such an argument has not been presented. It is sufficient for me to say that the contention of the petitioner here seems to me to be quite sound and in the absence of any argument to the contrary I shall uphold that contention.

Shortly the facts are that the petitioner is defendant 1 and he took a lease of the suit property for five years in 1928 from defendant 2 who was the owner of it. In 1931 the lease was cancelled and it appears that the petitioner then surrendered possession. The plaintiff got a decree against defendant 2 and in execution of that decree brought six acres of the property to sale. The sale was not confirmed at once because there was an application to set it aside presented by defendant 2 which was dismissed by the first Court and the dismissal of that application was affirmed on appeal on 31st January 1933 and the sale was then confirmed. The suit which is one for arrears of rent was filed on 28th February 1933 immediately after the Appellate Court had confirmed the sale. It seems to be conceded that defendant 1 after the sale to the plaintiff in execution of his decree paid the rent to defendant 2 as formerly but it is quite clear from Ex. 2 which is in answer to a notice sent to him by the plaintiff that defendant 1 was willing in view of the fact that there was a dispute between defendant 2 and the plaintiff as regards the sale of the property to take a receipt from both defendant 2 and the plaintiff or to take their directions with regard to the payment of future rent and that he had deposited a sum of Rs. 250 in the Tinnevelly District Permanent Fund. This I take to be a deposit of the rent pending the claim to it made by the former owner of the property defendant 2 or the plaintiff being substantiated. At any rate, it is a notice which is of importance because the plaintiff is asked to say to whom the rent is to be paid. It is found as a fact, I think, from the judgment that defendant 1 did pay rent to defendant 2. The suit was filed against both and a decree has gone against both although it seems to me that in the plaint relief was only asked for in the alternative if the rent should have been paid to defendant 2 then against defendant 2 only.

A proper reading of the plaint is I think that should the rent not have been paid over to defendant 2, by defendant 1, then there should be a decree against defendant 1 in respect of that unpaid rent. What seems to have been overlooked in this case is that although by reason of S. 65, Civil P. C. a property bought in execution of a decree vests in the purchaser from the date of the sale and when the sale has been made absolute the vesting is deemed to be from the date of the sale and not from the date when it became absolute, the sale in this case was not made absolute until after the payment of the rent had been made by defendant 1 to defendant 2 who was, until the sale was confirmed, his landlord. The confirmation of the sale was both after that time and the time when defendant 1 gave up possession to defendant 2. It appears to me that following the decision of the Privy Council in 64 M L J 544[1] although it was a decision under the Income-tax Act and although there is this fiction of relation back of the vesting defendant 1 quite properly paid to defendant 2 this rent and was entitled to do so until the sale had been confirmed. That of course is not to deprive the purchaser of the rent from the date of his purchase when his sale had been confirmed but it seems to me does protect the lessee until such time as the sale is confirmed in regard to any payment he has made to his former lessor. That being so, it seems to me that no decree ought to have been passed against defendant 1 and it should have been passed against defendant 2 alone. For the above reasons, the petition will be allowed with costs of the petitioner here and in the lower Court as against the plaintiff respondent 1 and the decree as against the petitioner set aside.

Letters Patent Appeal No. 114 of 1935. Decided on 3rd November 1937, against judgment of Varadachariar J. D/. 28th February 1935, reported in A I R 1935 Mad 764.

Grant — Free grant of valuable land by Revenue Officer is devoid of authority — Collector, in his revisional jurisdiction can cancel such grant and his order cannot be questioned by Civil Courts.

Under Madras Revenue Board's Standing Order No. 15 free grant of valuable land by a Revenue Officer is devoid of any authority and the Collector, in his revisional jurisdiction can cancel such grant as it is without authority and adverse to the interests of Government. Collector's order being within his powers, it is not open to Civil Courts to consider whether Collector's order is right or wrong on the merits. [P 319 C 2]

V. Suryanarayana — for Appellants.

N. Srinivasa Ayyangar — for Respondent.

chariar J. can be disposed of briefly. The case relates to a grant of three acres of valuable land by the Revenue Divisional Officer to the daffadar of his office in June 1922. That grant was set aside by the Collector in June 1925, under his revisional powers just within three years after the original grant. The original suit was instituted by the sons of the grantee to declare the Collector's order null and void and the original grant by the Revenue Divisional Officer valid. It must be mentioned in this connexion that subsequent to the grant, the land had been improved at some expense by the grantee, and the Collector granted one acre out of the three acres to the sons of the grantee as compensation for the improvement. The learned District Munsif who heard this suit, dismissed it as he was of opinion that the original grant by the Revenue Divisional Officer was null and void and that the Collector's order cancelling it was within the scope of his authority. The Subordinate Judge in appeal was of opinion that the grant was not in excess of the powers of the Revenue Divisional Officer and that there was no mistake of fact which entitled the Collector to exercise his revisional powers. The second appeal was instituted by the Secretary of State for India and that second appeal was allowed by Varadachariar J. who at the same time granted leave to appeal. Really the two substantial questions which arise in this case are those raised in paras. 6 and 10 of the written statement filed by the Collector which run as follows :

6. There is a clear prohibition against the free grant of valuable lands under B. S. O. No. 15 and the grant of the suit land by the Revenue Divisional Officer, Bhimavaram, is illegal and ultra vires.

10. Civil Courts have no jurisdiction to question the acts of Revenue Officers acting within the scope of their authority.

If these contentions are right, then it follows that the suit must fail and the judgment of our learned brother was right. As regards the first point, B. S. O. No. 15 which defines the limits of delegation of authority in the matter of grants of Crown land to various officers, clearly declares that valuable waste lands or valuable poramboke lands which are assigned after they are converted into assessed lands, should ordinarily be sold in public auction, the other alternative methods of disposal being sales in certain cases to applicants at a fixed price instead of by public auction, and assignment even under the dharkast rules, that is to say, free grant to members of the depressed classes subject to certain conditions. It is clear therefore that valuable lands, like the lands concerned in the present suit, could not have been granted to the daffadar in question, who was not a member of the depressed classes, and the original grant must therefore be considered to have been absolutely devoid of authority. It is not a case of the Revenue Divisional Officer acting in excess of his authority, but it is a case of his acting without authority altogether. This seems to us quite clear and does not require much argument to support it. A reference to the actual wording of the Board's Standing Order in question is sufficient.

As regards the other point, the revisional jurisdiction of the Collector as it stood when he exercised it in the present case, that is to say in 1925, enabled him to cancel the grant made by Revenue Divisional Officer if that grant was in excess of the limits of the latter's authority and if the interests of the Government or of the public were affected thereby. In the present case it is obvious that the grant was in excess of the authority conferred on the Revenue Divisional Officer and it was also adverse to the interests of the Government as a free grant of valuable land must necessarily affect the interest of the Government adversely. It must therefore be held that the Collector acted within the scope of the authority conferred upon him by B. S. O. No. 15 when he cancelled the grant in June 1925. When once the conditions necessary for the exercise of the revisional authority are satisfied, it is not open to a Civil Court to consider whether the order passed by the Collector in the exercise of such authority was right or wrong on the merits. In other words, Civil Courts cannot exercise revisional jurisdiction in respect of any order of the Collector which is within his revisional jurisdiction. These reasons are, in our opinion, quite sufficient to show that the second appeal was rightly allowed and the suit rightly dismissed. In the circumstances of the case however there will be no order as to costs in this appeal.

* Evidence Act (1872), S. 92, Proviso 1— S. 92 does not debar party to contract from adducing evidence for purpose of contradicting recitals of facts mentioned in document.

There is a great deal of difference between the terms of a contract and recitals of facts which are mentioned in a document. S. 92 debars a person who is a party to a contract from adducing any evidence which may "contradict, vary, add to or subtract from its terms" but there is no justification for holding that the recitals of facts mentioned in the document cannot be contradicted by evidence. [P 320 C 2]

The document which formed the basis of the suit, provided that as the defendant's wife was sickly and that as the plaintiff had been serving him and looking after his children and had no other means of livelihood, the defendant would continue to give a certain quantity of paddy to the plaintiff during her lifetime The defendant raised a plea that the plaintiff was to receive the paddy during her lifetime only if she served his wife and children and not otherwise and that he was willing to pay for the period for which she had so served:

Held that the defendant's plea amounted merely to a plea of failure of consideration and therefore oral evidence of the failure of consideration could be adduced under Proviso (1) to S. 92. [P 320 C 2]

K. Y. Adiga — for Appellant.

K. Sanjeevi Kamath — for Respondent.

Judgment.—The only point that has been urged in this appeal is that the defendant was debarred from raising the plea under S. 92, Evidence Act. The document Ex. A which is the basis of the suit, only states that as the defendant's wife was sickly and that the plaintiff had been serving him and looking after his children and had no other means of livelihood, the defendant would continue to give certain quantity of paddy to the plaintiff during her lifetime. It was also mentioned in the document that the defendant was a relation of the plaintiff's. It was contended before me that the defendant should not have been permitted to adduce any evidence against the contents of this document. I might say at the outset that there is a great deal of difference between the terms of a contract and the recitals of facts which are mentioned in a document. S. 92, Evidence Act, debars a person, who is a party to a contract from adducing any evidence which may "contradict, vary, add to or subtract from its terms" but there is no justification for holding that the recitals of facts mentioned in the document cannot be contradicted by evidence.

Taking the particular document in question, I find for instance a statement of a fact that the plaintiff was a relation of the defendant. The plaintiff herself in the witness box denied it. Can it be urged with any justification that the defendant would not be able to traverse this recital contained in Ex. A? There can only be one answer to the question. A great deal of stress was laid then by the counsel for the appellant on the contention that the plea raised and evidence led on behalf of the defendant to the effect that the defendant was only to receive paddy during her lifetime only if she served his wife and children could not be raised or substantiated by evidence as this was not covered by either proviso (3) or any other proviso to S. 92, Evidence Act. I do not agree with the contention. The defendant's plea amounted really, in my opinion, to a plea of failure of consideration. The defendant's case was that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the paddy for as long as services were rendered by her. He was therefore willing to pay for the period for which the plaintiff served his wife and children after the document was executed by him.

It may be stated at once that the document on the basis of which the suit was filed does not mention any consideration at all. But even if it did, evidence of the absence or failure of consideration could always be adduced under Proviso (1) to S. 92, Evidence Act. The plaintiff's assertion that future services might have been a motive but did not form a consideration for the document is also untenable. I would therefore repel the contention raised on behalf of the appellant that the evidence led on his behalf could not be adduced. The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 406 of 1935, Decided on 22nd October 1937, to revise order of District Court, Trichinopoly, in O. P. No. 34 of 1934.

(a) Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act (2 of 1927), S. 9 (5) — Court deciding under S. 9 (5) must advert to both the provisions contained in S. 9 (5) — Failure to do so would be ground for revision under S. 115, Civil P. C.

Under Section 9 (5), Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act, there are two grounds upon which a temple may be found to be excepted temple; the first category is temples in which right of succession to the office of trustee is hereditary and the second category consists of temples the succession to the trusteeship whereof has been specially provided for and therefore the Court when deciding under this sub-section must advert to both the provisions and his omission to do so will be a good ground for revision under S. 115, Civil P. C. [P 321 C 2]

(b) Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act (2 of 1927), Ss. 9 (5) and 84 — Provisions of succession to trusteeship made by founder need not continue to be in force at time of petition under S. 84.

The provision for the succession to the trusteeship of an institution which is made by the founder of it is something which is done once for all at or about the time of the foundation. The words in sub-s. (5) of S. 9 do not imply that the provision made by the founder must continue to be in force at the time of the petition under S. 84 of the Act. [P 321 C 2; P 322 C 1]

K. G. Srinivasa Iyer — for Petitioner.

A. V. Narayanaswami Iyer, R. K. Rajamannar and K. Parasurama Iyer — for Respondents.

Order. — This is a petition to revise the order of the learned District Judge of Trichinopoly in O. P. No. 34 of 1934. That was an application by the present appellant under S. 84 (2), Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act 2 of 1927, praying the learned Judge to set aside the order of the Religious Endowments Board dated 6th December 1933 declaring the temple of Sri Kalyana Narasimhaswami at Ramagiri, Karur Taluk, to be a non-excepted temple. The learned District Judge held that the temple was a non-excepted temple and accordingly dismissed the petition. The learned counsel for the petitioner has drawn my attention to the definition of "excepted temple" in S. 9 (5) of the Act. That is as follows :

> 'Excepted temple' means and includes a temple, the right of succession to the office of trustee or the officers of all the trustees (where there are more trustees than one) whereof has been hereditary or the succession to the trusteeship whereof has been specially provided for by the founder.

It is obvious from this definition that there can be two grounds upon which a temple may be found to be an excepted temple. The first category is temples in which the right of succession to the office of trustee is hereditary. The second category consists of temples the succession to the trusteeship whereof has been specially provided for by the founder. The learned District Judge in his order has considered only the first category and not the second. He has found on the admission of the appellant himself that succession to the office of trustee in the temple has not been in practice hereditary for at least 70 years. The learned District Judge has held that therefore the temple cannot be considered to be an excepted temple. The learned counsel for the petitioner contends that on the evidence produced before the learned District Judge, he would be able to show that the succession to the trusteeship of the temple was specially provided for by the founder. The learned District Judge has not adverted to this part of the definition and his omission to do so will justify interference in revision under S. 115, Civil P. C.

The learned counsel for the Religious Endowments Board is not able to argue that the learned District Judge did deal with the second part of the definition of "excepted temple". It has been held by Varadachariar J. in 59 Mad 245,[1] that the expression "has been hereditary" in sub-s. (5) of S. 9 must be construed as meaning "has been and continues to be hereditary". The learned counsel for respondent 2, the trustee appointed by the Religious Endowments Board, contends that the same interpretation must be put upon the words "the succession to the trusteeship whereof has been specially provided for by the founder". This contention I think cannot be accepted. The provision for the succession to the trusteeship of an institution like this which is made by the founder of it is something which is done once for all at or about the time of the foundation. It would be a misuse of language to say that these words in sub-s. (5) imply that the provision made by the founder must continue to be in force at the time of the petition under S. 84. The learned counsel for respondent 2 contends that there was no evidence before the learned District Judge upon which he could have found that the succession to the trusteeship of this temple had been specially provided for by the founder. That is a question into which I am not prepared to go for the simple reason that it has not been considered by the learned District Judge.

For these reasons, the order of the learned District Judge is set aside and the petition is ordered to be restored to file and disposed of according to law upon the evidence already recorded by and produced before the learned District Judge. The costs of this petition will abide the result and will be provided for in the decree of the District Court.

P. C. Parthasarathy Ayyangar — for Appellant.

C. Sambasiva Rao and P. Chandra Reddy — for Respondents.

Venkatasubba Rao J.—The plaintiff attacks in this suit certain alienations made after his father's death by his stepmother and grandmother who acted as his guardians during his minority. This appeal has been filed by the plaintiff and except as regard defendant 11, it was disposed of by us some two days ago. We are now concerned with the sale in favour of himself and another, for Rs. 700, evidenced by Ex. 2 dated 26th February 1917. The suit was brought in 1929, almost when the period of limitation prescribed for such actions was coming to an end.

The plaintiff challenged the sale on the ground that his father was leading an immoral and vicious life and the debts to discharge which the alienation was made, were incurred for purposes not binding upon him. The learned Judge finds clearly that these allegations are utterly untrue, that the sale was effected for discharging binding debts, that they were in fact paid off, that Rs. 700 was a fair price and that the plaintiff's guardians, who were capable women, acted in his interests and for his benefit. On these grounds the sale ought to have been upheld and the judgment leaves the impression that the Judge meant to uphold it. But somewhat abruptly he remarks towards the close of his discussion, that no pressure on the estate has been shown and it follows therefore that the sale is not binding on the plaintiff. Having said so, he sets aside the sale, but on the condition that the plaintiff before recovering the property must pay Rs. 700 to the vendees.

The plaintiff questions the validity of this direction and on his behalf it is contended that the sale ought to have been set aside in toto. The lower Court's judgment is undoubtedly wrong, but the plaintiff has no reason to complain against it. It has conferred on him an advantage which he does not possess under the law. There is no other course open to us than to dismiss the appeal and we accordingly do so. The respondent (defendant 11) unfortunately is not represented here and the appeal has been heard in his absence. But we have come to the conclusion that in the interests of justice we ought to take action under O. 41, R. 33, Civil P. C., which has been enacted to empower the Appellate Court to do complete justice between the parties. There are several cases of which it is sufficient to mention 53 Mad 881,[1] which have held that the Appellate Court has power under this rule to vary the decree of the lower Court, although the variation may benefit a party who has not appealed. To take a simple illustration, if a person sues for Rs. 1000, and after getting a decree for Rs. 400, files an appeal urging that he ought to have been allowed a larger sum, this section enables the Appellate Court to interfere in favour of the defendant who has not appealed and dismiss the suit in toto. It goes without saying that the Court will exercise a wise judicial discretion in using the power under this section.

We are quite satisfied that the circumstances of this case are such as to call for our interference under the wide terms of this very salutary provision. The alienees in this case are men of very humble status, one being a Boya and the other a Golla, and it is not surprising, when in all probability all their earnings have been invested in this property, that the respondent has not been able to find the money for preferring an appeal. This is a harassing suit of the usual type, brought to unsettle a title acquired by honest purchasers and we think we ought in the interests of justice to use our powers under the provision mentioned above. We are unable to accede to the strenuous contention to the contrary of Mr. P. C. Parthasarathy Ayyangar, the appellant's learned counsel. We need hardly mention that the lower Court's view of the law is thoroughly wrong. To mention only one authority, it has been laid down in 23 M L J 638[2] that it would be unreasonable to hold that a guardian cannot affect a sale in the absence of pressure from the creditor to whom the debt is due. It therefore follows that not only is the appeal rejected, but the suit as against defendant 11 is dismissed.

 Limitation Act (1908), Art. 182 (5) — Application for execution by nephew of deceased decree-holder praying that decree should be executed for benefit of himself and widow of decree-holder jointly as representatives of decree-holder — Counter-statement by widow that nephew's application should be dismissed and requesting that decree should be executed for her benefit alone — Application for execution dismissed — Subsequent application by widow for execution within three years of dismissal of previous application held in time.

The provisions of Art. 182 should receive a fair and not too technical a construction. Its language ought not to be strained in favour of the judgment-debtor who has not paid his debt and the words should be liberally interpreted in favour of the decree-holder. [P 324 C 2]

An application for execution was made by the nephew of a deceased decree-holder who prayed that he and the widow of the decree-holder should be brought on the record and the decree should be executed for their joint benefit. The widow, in a counter-statement requested that this application should be dismissed and added that she should be brought on record as the sole representative and the decree should be executed for her own benefit. Venkatasubba Rao J. — The question in this Letters Patent appeal, is whether the view of the learned Judge that the execution petition in question is barred by limitation is right. The lower Court had decided that the petition was in time and that decision was reversed by the learned Judge. The starting point under Art. 182 (5), Limitation Act is :

The date of the final order passed on an application made in accordance with law to the proper Court for execution or to take some step-in-aid of the execution of the decree.

One Subbaraju obtained the final decree in the mortgage suit in question on 9th September 1926 and the present petition was filed by his widow Annapurnamma on 23rd December 1931, for execution of that decree. It is contended that this execution petition is in time, by reason of a previous petition for execution filed on 15th October 1928, which was dismissed by an order dated 15th April 1929. The short point for decision is, whether the previous execution petition fulfils the requirements of Art. 182 (5), for, if it does, the present petition having been filed as it has been, within three years of the order referred to above made upon it, would be saved from the bar of limitation. The previous petition was filed not by Annapurnamma, the widow of the decree-holder, but by his nephew one Karumuri Subba Rao. This man, alleging that the decree amount belonged jointly to his uncle and himself, filed the petition, praying that both he and Annapurnamma should be brought on the record as the decree-holder's representatives, and, that the decree should be executed for their joint benefit. Annapurnamma by way of answer filed a counter affidavit, denying that the applicant possessed any sort of interest in the decree. It is upon a proper construction of this counter-affidavit that the decision in this appeal must turn.

True, as urged by Mr. Somasundaram for the respondent, the widow prayed in the last paragraph of this affidavit, that Subbarao's petition should be dismissed. If the matter had stopped there, there would be nothing to urge in favour of the appellant. But the widow was not content with asking that the petition should be dismissed; she did something more, that is to say, she requested that she should be brought on the record as the sole representative and that the decree should be executed for her sole benefit. Here we may quote her actual words :

> As all the properties of the late Subbaraju as well as the decree in this suit passed to this counter-petitioner, it is necessary that this counter-petitioner should be added as the second plaintiff and that this decree should be executed.

In effect, what she requested was that upon the nephew's petition praying that both he and Annapurnamma should be added as the deceased's representatives, an order should be made substituting her alone as the sole representative. In other words, she adopted the nephew's petition in part and repudiated it in part, and the proper interpretation of what happened is in our opinion this : The widow must be taken to have said to the Court :

> Here is the nephew's application which is in writing as required by the Code and is otherwise in conformity with the law. Take that application as mine and instead of bringing on record, as the nephew requests, both of us, substitute me alone as the legal representative. In that sense I am willing to treat the application as my own.

We see no reason why this construction of what happened at the time should not be adopted, and if that is done, the present petition would be in time. Some question was raised in the Courts below as well as before the learned Judge of this Court, as to whether there was or was not a step-in-aid of execution. In the view we have taken, no such question can arise. The point is not, whether there was a step-in-aid of execution, but whether the previous execution petition could or could not be deemed in law as that of Annapurnamma. Our answer is decisively in the affirmative. The provisions of Art. 182, it has been held, should receive a fair and not too technical a construction (Mitra on Limitation, Edn. 6 p. 2048). Its language ought not to be strained in favour of the judgment-debtor who has not paid his debt and the words should be liberally interpreted in favour of the decree-holder (Ibid p. 2075).

The cases cited by Mr. Somasundaram are easily distinguishable. In 28 Mad 396,[1] the application was made by the mother, although the person rightly entitled was the major son and as the judgment takes care to point out :

> There is nothing to show that he constituted her as his agent for the purpose of making the application.

In 4 M L W 291[2] again, the widow made the application setting up a title as against the adopted son, who, it is not suggested, either ratified or adopted her act. In the result the appeal is allowed and the decision of the Subordinate Judge is restored. Each party will bear his or her costs throughout.

Appeal No. 443 of 1936, Decided on 16th September 1937, against order of Sub.Judge, Madura, D/- 23rd September 1936.

(a) Mortgage—Appointment of Receiver—Receiver can eject mortgagor.

As a Receiver can be appointed on behalf of a simple mortgagee, it is a necessary concomitant of his office that he should be able to lease the property and that if he is obstructed by the mortgagor he can seek the aid of the Court to remove him: A I R 1933 Mad 570 (F B), Foll.; A I R 1936 All 495 (F B), Dissent. [P 326 C 1]

(b) Res Judicata—Mortgagee applying for removal of mortgagor — Court rejecting application — Another application by mortgagee at another stage for removal of mortgagor held not barred by constructive res judicata.

Where in a previous application by the mortgagee, the Court did not see fit to eject the mortgagor from possession, the mortgagee cannot be held to be estopped by the principle of constructive res judicata from again applying to the Court and asking it to eject the mortgagor. The Court might not have seen fit at a particular stage of the suit to pass an order evicting the mortgagor; but it is perfectly open to the Court if it sees fit at some later stage, to do so. In making its first order, the Court considered what was the most convenient course to adopt at that time; and in doing so, it certainly did not decide any question against the mortgagee either expressly or by implication which would amount to a decision on some point which would prevent the point being raised in a subsequent stage of the suit. Judgment.—The appellants mortgaged the property in question to the respondents. The respondents obtained a decree; but because of the various applications that the appellants made in this Court and other tactics that they adopted, the sale has not taken place even now. The respondents thereupon put in an application for the appointment of a Receiver and a Receiver was appointed. Certain allowances were given to the appellants for their expenses; and they were allowed to remain in possession of that part of one of the houses in which they lived. Subsequently, the present order was passed ordering them to vacate that part of the house also, because the Receiver was unable to realize any rent for the benefit of the mortgagees. Hence this appeal.

The learned counsel for the appellants places reliance on A I R 1936 All 495,[1] a Full Bench case of that Court. Their Lordships in that case came to the conclusion that although the first part of O. 40, R. 1, was wide enough to enable a Receiver to be appointed in all cases, yet Clause 2 of that Rule meant in practice that a Receiver could not be appointed on behalf of a simple mortgagee, the reason being that the mortgagee was not entitled to immediate possession and that the Receiver could not be appointed as there was no use in appointing a Receiver if he could not enter into possession. This decision meant that a Receiver should not be appointed on the application of a simple mortgagee. It is conceded that the finding that a Receiver should never be appointed on behalf of a simple mortgagee is not the law current in this presidency; but it is contended that this Court, although holding in Full Bench case, 56 Mad 915,[2] following older cases that a Receiver could be appointed in such suits, this Court has nowhere given a finding that Cl. 2 of O. 40, R. 1, did not apply to the possession and dispossession of the mortgagor. It is seen however from a reading of Allahabad case[1] that the principal reason why the Allahabad High Court came to the conclusion that a Receiver ought not to be appointed in suits on a simple mortgage, is that Cause 2 of O. 40, Rule 1, did not permit of a Receiver dispossessing the mortgagor. Their Lordships of the Allahabad High Court expressed dissent from the judgment of the Full Bench of this High Court in 56 Mad 915,[2] where the opinion was held that the appointment of a Receiver was not dispossession at all as the Receiver held possession on behalf of the mortgagor and merely preserved the profits from the property for the benefit of the mortgagee in case the mortgaged property was not found sufficient. I cannot therefore, in the face of 56 Mad 915,[2] accept the reasoning in the Allahabad case which formed the basis of a decision completely at variance with that in 56 Mad 915.[2] If, as is the law in this presidency, a Receiver can be appointed, it is a necessary concomitant of his office that he should be able to lease the property and that if he is obstructed by the mortgagor he can seek the aid of the Court to remove him. If the arguments of the learned counsel for the appellants were correct, a Receiver in a mortgage suit would be able to do nothing at all if the mortgagor chose to resist him; for, the mortgagor could remain on his property and because he was in possession he could not be dispossessed. Even if he did not occupy the whole of the property himself but leased it to some other person, that other person's possession would be possession of the mortgagor; and the Receiver and the Court would be equally powerless to collect rent from that other person if he desired to pay the rent to the mortgagor himself. Clause (d) of O. 40, R. 1, confers upon the Receiver power to manage the property and to collect the rents and profits thereof and he cannot do this against the obstruction of the mortgagor unless he is allowed to enter into possession himself.

The next contention raised on behalf of the appellants is that as in a previous application by the mortgagee the Court did not see fit to eject the mortgagor from possession, the mortgagee was estopped by the principle of constructive res judicata from again applying to the Court and asking it to eject the mortgagor. I cannot accept this contention. The Court may not have seen fit at a particular stage of the suit to pass an order evicting the mortgagor; but it was perfectly open to the Court if it saw fit at some later stage, to do so. In making its first order, the Court considered what was the most convenient course to adopt at that time; and in doing so it certainly did not decide any question against the mortgagee either expressly or by implication which would amount to a decision on some point which would prevent that point being raised in a subsequent stage of the suit.

The last contention is that the Court has not found that the mortgagor by his conduct has merited such an order. It is clear however from a perusal of the order appealed against and from the various proceedings that have taken place at the instance of the mortgagor, that the mortgagor has succeeded for a long period of years in preventing the mortgagee from realizing the fruit of his decree. I am certainly of opinion that the lower Court was quite justified in passing the order it did. In the result the appeal is dismissed with costs of the contesting respondent.

V. Radhakrishnayya — for Plaintiff.

Order.—T. O. S. No. 16 of 1936 is an application to revoke the letters of administration granted as in an intestacy in O. P. No. 129 of 1914 (now T. O. S. No. 11 of 1936) and to grant probate to the petitioner Alamelu Ammal of a will a copy of which is tendered in evidence. The alleged testator is one Krishnamoorthi, husband of the petitioner Alamelu Ammal. He died on 26th April 1914 leaving, by the petitioner, three sons and a daughter, the eldest son being the present respondent, Parthasarathi. There was another family by one Ethiraja Ammal, who was either a wife or a concubine. The will which Alamelu Ammal propounds divides the estate between the petitioner, her daughter and the children of the alleged concubine. Shortly after the death of Krishnamoorthi, his son, the present respondent Parthasarathi, applied for letters of administration as in an intestacy. Notices were served on his mother, and his brothers and sister and in due course letters of administration were issued without any objection in September 1915. In 1923 there was a partition of the properties, as a result of which Parthasarathi got the house which under the will now propounded would go to his mother, the present petitioner. In 1935 there was a further partition of properties subsequently acquired as a result of litigation.

The will now propounded, which is dated 25th November 1912 was first asserted in a lawyer's notice sent by the present petitioner on 25th August 1936. Her allegation is that she had only recently found that copy on which her petition is based. This copy is admittedly in the hand-writing of the respondent Parthasarathi. It begins with the phrase > Know all concerned that this is my will signed by me in the presence of the two gentlemen who have attested it.

It purports to contain a copy of the signature of the testator, and at the foot of it there are the words, "signed before us," but no names of attesting witnesses are found beneath that phrase. The copy therefore contains an indication that the original was signed and that there was an intention that it should be attested by two witnesses, but no indication that these two attesting witnesses ever did attest it, nor is there any indication as to their identity. The petitioner has no other evidence of the due execution of the will except any inference which might be drawn from the various statements of the respondent. In the first place we have the fact that in the original application for letters of administration he asserted that there was no will, and the persons to whom notices were sent did not contradict this assertion. In the reply to the notice of August 1936, the respondent again asserted, "My father left no will nor have I ever come into possession of any will of my father or suppressed the same." It must be remarked that at this time the petitioner had not revealed the fact that she had in her possession a copy of it in the handwriting of the respondent. Then we have a statement in an affidavit sworn by the respondent on 19th October 1936, in which he says:

> I further deny that to the best of my knowledge my father ever left any will on or about 25th November 1912. I am not aware till now of the existence of any such will. I deny that I ever took possession of any such will or suppressed the same.

In his reply to the affidavit in support of the present petition, the respondent admits that the copy of the will is in his handwriting but denies that the will was attested by any witnesses or that he was ever in possession of the original will. He says that he came across the original during his father's illness in 1913, questioned his father about it, and was told that it had been written to satisfy the importunities of the mother of the concubine. He adds that on the intervention of a relative his father was satisfied that there was no necessity for this will and destroyed the original in the presence of this relative, the respondent himself, the petitioner and the mother of the concubine. Except for petitioner and the respondent, these alleged witnesses of the destruction of the will are dead.

Now it is quite clear that the burden of proving valid execution of the will rests on the petitioner. When this burden has been discharged, it will be incumbent upon the respondent to prove that the will was revoked. The petitioner has no positive evidence at all, except the circumstances summarized above, that any such will as is asserted was ever actually executed in such a manner as would make it a good will in law. It is suggested that since the will was apparently executed outside Madras city, it would be a good will so far as it relates to properties outside this city even in the absence of attestors, the argument being based on the decision in 59 M L J 596[1]. With reference to this argument, I must remark that there is really no evidence as to the place of execution at all. The copy filed in Court contains no indication, and no evidence has been put before me, as to the place of residence of the testator on the date of the alleged execution of the will. It is pointed out that there is an assertion in the petition that the alleged testator was a resident at Guntur and it is admitted by the respondent that when the copy was taken by him the document which he copied was actually at Guntur. This however does not seem to me to be sufficient proof that the will was actually executed at Guntur. So far as it relates to the house in Madras, it is certainly not a valid will without attestation. Moreover, I doubt whether when the will itself clearly contemplates the signatures of two attesting witnesses to make it a complete transaction, it could be held that it had been properly executed in the absence of proof that the contemplated formalities were completed.

It is urged on behalf of the petitioner that the Court can presume on the materials before it that there was a valid execution of the will. Mr. Radhakrishnayya has quoted three English cases in which the Court relying on the maxim "omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta" has filled up the gap in the evidence of the completion of all the formalities by inferring that those things had been done which in the ordinary course of events having regard to the known circumstances are likely to have been done. One of these cases is (1890) 15 P D 170.[2] It was a case in which the will was lost; there was no copy; the names of the attestors were known, and both were dead; there was no proof of any proper attestation clause; but there was good evidence as to the execution and contents of the will and the fact that it was signed by one of the known attestors and that it was in existence at the time of the testator's death. On these facts it was presumed to have been validly executed. It will be noticed that in the present case we do not know the names of the attestors, or if there were any attestors at all, nor do we know positively that any such will was in existence at the date of the testator's death, so that the inference to be drawn from the circumstances in the present case must go a great deal further than in the case just cited. The case in (1888) 13 P D 2[3] is not of much assistance to the petitioner. That was a case in which there was no room for the signatures of the attesting witnesses at the foot of the will and they were found at the top of the next page. They admitted their signatures but had no recollection of actually attesting this particular document. Here again the Court inferred that the document was validly executed. The case in (1917) L R P 93[4] was a case of a lost will in which there was clear and good evidence that the will was validly executed and attested, but the witnesses could not remember the names of the attestors. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to establish that the will was duly executed. This was a case in which there was no contest; but clearly the evidence went a great deal further than that placed before me.

For the respondents, two English cases have been cited in which evidence somewhat similar to that now before me was held to be insufficient. One is in (1858) 164 E R 632,[5] where the testator residing in India sent to his solicitor in England a copy of his will without any copy of his own signature or the signatures of the attesting witnesses and asked to be informed if the will needed revision in any respect. No revision was suggested and subsequently the testator sent what purported to be a copy of a codicil referring to the previous will, the codicil copy containing the names of the signatory and the witnesses. Shortly afterwards the testator was killed in the Mutiny and no other evidence was forthcoming as to the valid execution of the will and codicil and it was held that the statement of the testator contained in his letters were not sufficient to prove due execution. A somewhat similar decision is found in 22 L T 489.[6] These cases seem to go on the point that at common law a statement of a deceased person regarding facts within his knowledge would not be evidence unless it relates to one of the circumstances which can be proved by the secondary evidence of extra-judicial statements by the deceased person, similar to those embodied in S. 32, Evidence Act.

Looking into the facts of the present case from a practical point of view, what is it that we have established? We know that there was in existence at some time what purported to be a will dated 25th November 1912. We have the statement of the respondent that he saw this will in the possession of the testator in 1913 and that it was unattested. The copy of that will contains an indication that attestations were contemplated. There is no evidence whatever that any attestations were made. There is no evidence that the original will was in existence at the time of the testator's death. We might infer from the fact that he signed this will with an intention to complete it. But can we infer its actual completion ? I do not think we can. Nor do I think we can infer from the somewhat disingenuous statements of the respondent when taxed with the existence of such a will, a knowledge that there was ever in existence a duly completed and validly attested will such as is now asserted. All that we might infer is that he probably knew of the existence of this copy and was not sure whether the petitioner had seen the copy or not. Taking all the materials together, I am of the opinion that the valid execution of this will has not been proved. It is therefore unnecessary to call upon the respondent to prove its revocation. T. O. S. No. 16 of 1936 is dismissed with the costs of the contesting respondent. The letters of administration granted in T. O. S. No. 11 of 1936 will be re-granted.

Civil Misc. Petn. Nos. 3166 and 3167 of 1937, Decided on 5th November 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Madura, in A. S. No. 4 of 1935.

(a) Civil P. C. It is true that the duty of framing issues has been cast by the Civil Procedure Code on Courts. But it must not be forgotten that it is essential for the parties also to draw the attention of the Court to an omission in framing issues. Where therefore the issue in regard to a party as being an unnecessary party was not pressed on his behalf deliberately when the issues were being framed it must in the circumstances be held to have been waived by him.  (b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 41, R. 22—Cross-objections can be filed by respondent against person who, though party to suit, was not impleaded by appellant as party to appeal.

The provisions contained in O. 41, R. 22, are quite general and entitle a respondent to take any cross-objection to the decree which he could have taken by way of appeal. A respondent's right to file cross-objections and ask for relief cannot be restricted to the parties only who have been impleaded in the appeal at the instance of the appellant. If the respondent could file an appeal against a respondent, who although not a party to the appeal, was yet a party to the suit, there is nothing in the words of O. 41, R. 22, which would prevent him from raising the contention in his cross objections which could be raised by him in an appeal : A I R 1920 Mad 120, Rel. on ; A I R 1920 Lah 438, Explained ; A I R 1931 Mad 133, Disting. [P 330 C 2 ; P 331 C 1]

Order. — A suit for possession and injunction was filed by one Guzulu Devendra Iyer against Muthu Chettiar as defendant 1 and Venkateswara Iyer as defendant 2 in July 1931 in the Court of the District Munsif at Melur in which the tenant was also impleaded as defendant 3. Certain mesne profits were also claimed by the plaintiff in the suit. While filing his written statement, defendant 1 raised a number of contentions in which he attacked the locus standi of the plaintiff to maintain the suit on the ground that he was not an occupancy tenant and asserted that the othi (Ex. A-1) was invalid. It was admitted by him that he was the landholder but alleged that defendant 2 was in possession of the lands in suit and that the land was rightfully sold to him in a revenue auction for arrears of rent. It was also pleaded on his behalf that he was an unnecessary party to the suit. A number of issues were then framed by the lower Court, but the objection raised by defendant 1 that he was an unnecessary party did not form the subject matter of an issue at all.

It is true that as contended on behalf of the respondent, the duty of framing issues has been cast by the Civil Procedure Code on Courts. But it must not be forgotten that at least on a technical matter like this, it is essential for the parties also to draw the attention of the Court to such an omission. In view of serious contentions raised on behalf of defendant 1 on the merits of the claim, it appears to me that the issue in regard to defendant 1 as being an unnecessary party was not pressed on his behalf deliberately when the issues were being framed and must in the circumstances be held to have been waived by him. This inference is further strengthened by the fact that the trial proceeded for about an year and a half and yet nothing was said or done by or on behalf of defendant 1 who would have drawn the attention of the Court to such an omission, although another issue was subsequently added by the trial Court. In fact, the result of the case in which a decree for possession was passed against defendant 1 in addition to defendant 2 shows very clearly that there was no merit in that objection and must be necessarily, although impliedly, taken to have been decided against defendant 1.

An appeal was filed by defendant 2 against the judgment and decree of the trial Court passed on 30th January 1933 to the District Court Judge at Madura to which defendant 1 was naturally impleaded as a respondent. Having been served with a notice of appeal on 14th July 1933, he filed cross-objections on 14th August 1933. The only ground which was raised in these objections was that he should not have been held liable for the costs of the suit. When the matter came up for hearing, all the grounds urged by the appellant (i. e., defendant 2) failed but strangely enough the Subordinate Judge found that defendant 1 was an unnecessary party. He came to this finding on the grounds that defendant 1 had first of all disclaimed possession and the relief asked for by the plaintiff was one in which defendant 2 was alone interested. It was apparently overlooked that the plaintiff had in this case asked for possession against both defendant 1 and defendant 2. The allegations in the plaint alone should have been looked into in order to come to a finding whether defendant 1 was or was not a necessary party. If the plaintiff had failed to establish his allegations, the suit should have been dismissed against him on the merits. This was however not done. The finding arrived at by the Subordinate Judge is all the more surprising when one finds that this ground was not even taken by defendant 1 in his cross-objections.

Aggrieved by the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court, defendant 2, filed a second appeal and since defendant 1 was held to be an unnecessary party by the Subordinate Judge, he was not impleaded. The plaintiff has now filed cross-objections in which he prays that a decree for possession and costs should have been passed by the lower Appellate Court not only against defendant 2 but also against defendant 1. A separate petition has also been given on his behalf that in the circumstances of the case, defendant 1 should be impleaded as a party to the appeal. Not being content with his cross-objections and the petition filed to implead defendant 1 as a party to the appeal, he has yet put in another petition in which he has asked his cross-objections to be converted into a second appeal and prayed for the delay in filing the appeal to be excused. This has been done as stated by his counsel while arguing the case by way of caution.

The real point which I have now been called upon to decide is whether the cross-objections filed on behalf of the plaintiff are competent against defendant 1 who has not been made a party to the appeal and if not whether he could be ordered to be impleaded as a party to the appeal under the provisions of O. 1, R. 10 read with S. 107, Civil P. C. If I hold on either of the two points in favour of the plaintiff, it is obvious that no orders need be passed on the third application of his in which he has asked for his cross-objections to be converted into an appeal and for excusing the delay under S. 5, Limitation Act. The provisions contained in O. 41, R. 22 are quite general in my opinion and entitle a respondent to take any cross-objection to the decree which he could have taken by way of appeal. It has been already held in a Full Bench ruling of this Court given in 38 Mad 705[1] and followed in 41 Mad 904[2] and A I R 1923 Lah 39[3] that a respondent could urge cross-objections against a co-respondent in any and every case. If this be so, why should a respondent's right to file cross-objections and ask for relief be restricted to the parties only who have been impleaded in the appeal at the instance of the appellant. If the respondent could file an appeal against a respondent who although not a party to the appeal was yet a party to the suit, there is nothing in the words of O. 41, R. 22 which would prevent him from raising the contention in his cross-objections which could be raised by him in an appeal. I am supported in this view by a ruling of a Division Bench of this Court given in 11 M L W 602.[4]

The respondent's counsel cited 54 I C 971[5] in support of his contention that inasmuch as the respondent was not a party to the appeal, no cross-objection could be entertained against him. In that case no notice was issued to a defendant who was affected by the cross-objections and the lower Appellate Court had, in spite of the absence of that defendant chosen to pass a decree against him. This was obviously wrong. Moreover unlike the present case, the defence of the two defendants one of whom was impleaded in appeal and the other who was not were not common. But if that ruling meant to lay down the general proposition that no cross-objections could be entertained against a person who although a party to the suit, was not impleaded by the appellant as a party to the appeal, I would with great respect disagree. I see nothing in the words of O. 41, R. 22 and no principle of law under which such a contention should be allowed to prevail. The other ruling cited on behalf of respondent, A I R 1931 Mad 133[6] has no application to the facts of this case.

At all events the Court has ample powers under the provisions of O. 1, R. 10 (2) read with S. 107, Civil P. C. to implead any person in the appeal as a respondent who ought to have been joined or whose presence before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court to adjudicate upon all the questions involved in the appeal effectively.

In view of what has been said, I consider that by putting in cross-objections defendant 1 has been legally impleaded in this appeal. In any case I would order him to be so impleaded under the provisions of O. 1, R. 10 (2) read with S. 107, Civil P. C. It is unnecessary for me now to consider the third application for converting the cross-objections into a second appeal and for excusing the delay. I would prefer to pass no orders on this application. Defendant 1 shall bear the costs of the application.

Sarvajana Sowkiabhi Virdhi Nidhi Ltd., Coimbatore — Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 1144 and Civil Misc. Petn. No. 5105 of 1936, Decided on 10th September 1937, against decree of Sub-Judge, Coimbatore, in A. S. No. 128 of 1936.

(a) Specific Relief Act (1877), S. 42—S entrusted with plaintiff's jewels, pledging them with defendant — S convicted for breach of trust and jewels ordered to be returned to plaintiff—High Court in revision holding that jewels should be returned to defendant—Plaintiff obtaining possession of jewels before High Court's order and returning them to Magistrate after 10 months of such order—Suit by plaintiff for declaration that he was entitled to possession of jewels—Magistrate held jewels not as plaintiff's but defendant's agent—Suit for mere declaration without claiming possession was not sufficient.

The plaintiff was the owner of certain jewels which he entrusted to one S for sale who committed breach of trust and pledged them with the defendant Bank. The jewels were ordered by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, who convicted S, to be returned to the plaintiff. The High Court in revision held that jewels should be returned to the defendant Bank and ordered accordingly. Before the order was passed by the High Court, the plaintiff obtained possession of the jewels from the Sub-Magistrate and returned them to him 10 months after the order and instituted a suit for declaration that he was entitled to the possession of the jewels. The jewels continued to be in the possession of the Sub-Magistrate :

Held that the Sub-Magistrate continued to hold the jewels from the time they were handed over to him by the plaintiff, for the purpose of handing them back to the defendant in pursuance of the order of the High Court, only as the agent of the defendant. The plaintiff was not in possession of the jewels. Therefore the suit for declaration without a prayer for possession was not sufficient : 36 Mad 62 and 27 Mad 591, Disting. ; A I R 1933 Mad 503, Rel. on.

(b) Pleadings — Amendment of plaint in second appeal—Objection to maintainability of suit taken in written statement—Defendant risking point being decided against him in lower Courts — Amendment of plaint in second appeal is unfair.

Where in a suit for declaration, the plaintiff has not chosen to amend his plaint by adding a prayer for possession from the time the legal objection was taken in the written statement of the defendant and has taken the risk of the point being decided against him in the lower Court, it is not fair to the defendant to allow an amendment of the plaint in the second appeal and to force the defendant to a retrial. [P 333 C 2]

Judgment. — The plaintiff was the owner of certain jewels, which he entrusted to one Subba Rao for sale, who committed breach of trust and pledged them with the defendant Bank. Subba Rao was convicted and the property was ordered by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate who convicted him to be returned to the plaintiff. The High Court in revision held that as the jewels had been taken from the defendant Bank they should be returned to the Bank and ordered the jewels to be given to the Bank. Before the order was passed, the plaintiff had obtained possession of the jewels; and for 10 months after the order of the High Court was passed possession of the jewels was with the plaintiff. On 11th June 1934 the plaintiff handed over the jewels to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate and on the same day filed the present suit in the District Munsif's Court for a declaration that he was entitled to the possession of the jewels. At the same time he filed a petition that the Court should order the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to retain the jewels or, better still, to send them to the District Munsif's Court. Eventually this was done. The District Munsif dismissed the plaintiff's suit on the merits. In appeal to the Subordinate Judge's Court, the plaintiff succeeded on the merits; but the dismissal of the suit was confirmed on the technical ground that the plaintiff should have asked for possession and not merely for a declaration. Hence this second appeal by the plaintiff to this Court.

The contention of the learned advocate for the appellant is that since at the time when the suit was filed the jewels were actually in the custody of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, it must be considered that the jewels were in custodia legis and not held specifically by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate on behalf of the defendant, and that therefore all that was necessary for the plaintiff to do was to obtain a declaration that the jewels belonged to him. The learned advocate for the appellant relies chiefly on 36 Mad 62.[1] That was a case in which the Magistrate under S. 146, Criminal P. C. attached some property because he was unable to decide to which of two disputants it belonged. It would appear from the original records that the attachment was on 5th December 1903. On 27th March 1905 the High Court passed an order setting aside the attachment and ordering the property in question to be returned to the defendants. The Magistrate did not however raise the attachment until 5th February 1906. Before that was done on 1st November 1905 the plaintiff filed a suit for a declaration of his right to the property. It was held in that case that a declaration was sufficient, because although the High Court had ordered the property to be restored to the defendant, the Magistrate had not in fact done so. A somewhat similar case arose in 27 Mad 591[2] where in certain guardian proceedings, the plaintiff was appointed a receiver of the minor's property. The High Court set aside that order and ordered the property to be returned to the defendant. Before the property was actually returned, the plaintiff filed a suit for a declaration that he was entitled to the possession of the property. For reasoning similar to that given in 36 Mad 62[1] it was held that a declaration was sufficient. A case that is much relied on by the respondent as bearing a greater resemblance to the present case is 38 M L W 194,[3] where a certain sum of money was obtained in execution. While the money was still in the custody of the Court, the daughter-in-law of the decree-holder brought a suit for a declaration that she was entitled to the money. It was held in that case by Pakenham Walsh J. that a suit for a declaration was not sufficient, for the High Court was holding the property for the decree-holder; so that the daughter-in-law, who was a stranger to the execution proceedings, had to ask for possession of the property, because she was not in possession. Nor was the Court in custody of the property except as the agent of the decree holder. In that case 27 Mad 591,[2] was referred to and distinguished as being a case in which the Court was holding the property for such person as might eventually be found entitled to it and not specifically on behalf of a certain person, as the executing Court does with respect to property realized in execution. Although 38 M L W 194[3] was decided by a single Judge, the matter was reconsidered in a Letters Patent appeal; and the Judges who heard that appeal expressed their entire approval of what had been said by Pakenham Walsh J. 36 Mad 62[1] was not expressly referred to; but as far as I can see, 36 Mad 62[1] is no stronger a case for the appellant than 27 Mad 591.[2] Although the Magistrate had received an order from the High Court that the property was to be returned to the defendant it had not in fact been returned when the suit was filed. The Court had taken the property in order that it might hold it until the Civil Court had decided the rights of the parties; and it continued to hold that property for the same purpose until it actually handed it back to the defendant.

It cannot be said that from the date of the order of the High Court the property was no longer in custodia legis and was held by the Court only as an agent of the defendant. It has been argued that when the appellant handed over the jewels to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate the Sub-Divisional Magistrate either held them as a Court to be handed over to the person who was rightfully entitled to them or held them as an agent of the plaintiff-appellant. He clearly did not hold the jewels as an agent of whomsoever might be found by the Civil Court to have a right to them. In the very first instance he purported to hold the jewels for the plaintiff and, after the receipt of the order of the High Court for the defendant. Moreover the present case differs from one in which the Court had all along held possession of the jewels; for, the appellant actually handed over the jewels to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, and the purpose for which he handed them over was that they might be returned to the defendant. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate could not have taken the jewels from the appellant and retained them as the agent of the appellant until such time as he actually handed them over physically to defendant. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate has ordered the appellant to give up the jewels; and if he had not done so, the Court would doubtless have taken action against the appellant. When therefore the Court took the jewels from the appellant it certainly did not take them as the agent of the plaintiff, to keep them in its custody on his behalf; but took them from the possession of the appellant and held them as the agent of the defendant until such time as it could hand them over to the defendant. I therefore hold that at the time when the suit was filed, the jewels were not in the possession of the appellant and that the lower Court was therefore right in holding that a suit for a declaration was not sufficient.

A petition has been filed in this second appeal asking this Court to grant permission to the plaintiff to amend his plaint. In considering whether this prayer should be granted or not, it has to be borne in mind that even in the written statement itself an objection was raised as to the maintainability of the suit on the ground that the plaintiff had not asked for possession. The plaintiff, during the course of the trial, did not ask to be allowed to amend this plaint; nor did he ask to be allowed to do so during the appeal. Even in this Court he has asked to be allowed to amend the plaint only in case this Court holds against him on the main point raised, i. e., on the question of the possession of the jewels at the time the suit was laid. The plaintiff was therefore fully aware from the date of the filing of the written statement that the defendant was contending that the suit was not maintainable on the ground that he had not asked for possession. He was not only aware that a legal objection had been taken; but he was prepared to go on with the suit and the appeal and to take the risk of this point being decided against him. He cannot therefore reasonably ask at this stage to be allowed to amend his plaint; and it would be unfair to the defendant to be forced to submit to a retrial because of the plaintiff's obstinacy. His petition, C. M. P. No. 5105 of 1936, is therefore dismissed. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs. A memorandum of cross-objection has been filed with regard to the finding in appeal on the merits. This point does not arise in view of the fact that in any case the suit has to be dismissed because there is no prayer for possession. There has been no argument on this memorandum of cross-objections and so it is dismissed without costs. Leave to appeal is granted.

K. S. Narayana Ayyangar — for Respondents.

Pandrang Row J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Venkataramana Rao J. in S. A. No. 469 of 1932 dated 14th April 1936. The second appeal arose out of a suit for a declaration that the plaintiff and his family were entitled to the first honours, namely thirtham, thulasi, and Sri Satari on the occasion of the Pavittrotsavam festival in the temple of Sri Sarangapani Swami at Kumbakonam. The plaintiff's case was that he and his family had been performing the said festival from time immemorial and that immediately after the prayers or worship are over an offering of food prepared at the plaintiff's expense is offered to the deity and after karpoora arathi the plaintiff has to be given thirtham, thulasi, etc., and Sri Satari has to be placed over his head with parivattam, i. e., a piece of silk cloth. The claim was thus, as stated by Venkataramana Rao J. "rested on long-standing custom and practice" and related entirely to "first honours" in connexion with the festival which the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to conduct in the temple. The only question that arose before Venkataramana Rao J. was whether the decree passed in the suit in respect of these honours was right or whether the Court had no jurisdiction to pronounce such a decree as the subject-matter of the litigation was not of the nature of a civil right and therefore not within the jurisdiction of a Civil Court.

The learned Judge referred to several decisions bearing on the point, namely 32 Mad 291,[1] 1913 M W N 289,[2] 31 M L J 758[3] and 41 M L W 752.[4] He expressed the opinion that if the question were res integra, he should have been inclined to follow the observations of Sadasiva Iyer J. in 1913 M W N 289,[2] apparently referring to that learned Judge's observations on pp. 299 and 300. But he was of opinion that he was bound to follow the Bench decision in 31 M L J 758,[3] in which it was decided that the honours claimed were appurtenant to the right of worship and therefore the right to such honours was a civil right, it being assumed or not contested seriously in that case that the right to perform the festival was a civil right. The learned Judge however referred to 41 M L W 752,[4] also a Bench decision, which expressly dissented from the proposition laid down in 31 M L J 758,[3] as will be seen from the extract given in the judgment appealed from :

> A special kind of worship, to which some dignity is attached, but no emoluments of value are attached, cannot, in our opinion, be the subject of a suit in a Civil Court. To this extent we do not agree with the decision in 31 M L J 758.[3]

In these circumstances, it is not possible to say why the learned Judge thought that he was bound to follow the Bench decision in 31 M L J 758[3] and not the decision in 41 M L W 752[4] which was a later decision and more or less coincided with his own view on the subject. Whatever that may be, we have to decide the question whether the right that is claimed in the present suit to first thirtham, thulasi, and the placing of Sri Satari on the head is a civil right which can be agitated in Civil Court and decreed by a Civil Court. We are of opinion that the view enunciated in 41 M L W 752[4] is right. It is not disputed that where a religious office is claimed any emoluments attached thereto may be sued for in a Civil Court either with the office or without the office; in other words where a man's right to the office is not disputed but he does not get his emoluments he may sue on the emoluments in a Civil Court; or if his claim to the office is not recognized he may sue for the office as well as for the emoluments. But the right to perform a festival cannot in our opinion be regarded as a right to an office. An attempt was made to apply the analogy of office to the case of a right of worship in 31 M L J 758[3] but that attempt did not succeed, the Bench having declined to accept that contention which was put forward by the Advocate-General before them. There is no doubt at the same time that a right to take part in public worship in a temple, or of a deity outside while being taken in procession is a civil right. The question however remains whether the right to individual and exclusive worship of the deity, i. e. to the exclusion of other worshippers is a civil right. It is however not necessary to decide whether such exclusive right of worship is a civil right for the purpose of this appeal. It is enough to say that the point is not conceded definitely by Mr. K. Bhashyam Ayyangar who appears for the appellant and that it is a question that may have to be fully considered on some future occasion when it is necessary to do so.

In the present appeal it is possible to start with the assumption that the right to such exclusive worship is a civil right. Even on this assumption, it does not follow that the right to the "first honours" that are claimed in the present suit is a civil right. The right of worship is one thing and the right to receive certain honours or trifling gifts such as thulasi and holy water is another. According to Sadasiva Iyer J., the latter are only conferred by grace of the deity, and cannot be claimed as of right. Even otherwise and even assuming that the right to receive thirtham, thulasi and to have the Sri Satari placed on one's head is a necessary concomitant of worship, it does not follow that precedence or the order in which these things are done is a civil right. In the present case it is clear from the reliefs sought in the plaint as well as from the decree that has been passed in the plaintiff's favour that the relief that was sought for and granted was to enable the plaintiff to get what are known as "first honours" to the exclusion of the patrachariars. The plaint seeks first honours to the exclusion of the patrachariars and the decree also declares that the plaintiff and his family are entitled to first honours as stated in the plaint and not the patrachariars of whom defendants 2 to 5 are the representatives. The decree further restrains the receiver, defendant 1, by a permanent injunction from showing any first honours to the patrachariars, and from refusing to show such honours to the plaintiff : in other words the controversy between the parties is not whether the plaintiff and his family are to get thirtham, thulasi etc. at all, but that they should get them before any one else, and in particular before the defendant-patrachariars get them. So far as we can understand, these defendants have no objection to the plaintiff and his family getting the thirtham, thulasi, etc. after they themselves are given the same; and so far as we can see, also, the plaintiff has no objection to the patrachariars getting these things after the plaintiff and his family get them.

This is a clear indication of the fact that the actual and real controversy between the parties is not merely the right to receive the particular articles or honours mentioned in the plaint namely thulasi, thirtham and Sri Satari, but to receive them before any one else, and in particular the patrachariar-defendants. It is therefore a mere question of dignity or precedence and nothing more. The right to a dignity or precedence of this nature cannot in our opinion be regarded as a right of civil nature, whether it is claimed in a temple or elsewhere so long as it is not attached to an office. It follows therefore that this appeal must be allowed and that the decree which adjudicates upon matters which are not rights of a civil nature must be set aside. The appellants are entitled to have their costs from the plaintiff-respondent in all the Courts.

BURN AND MOCKETT JJ.

In re Ramaswami—Prisoner—Accused.

Referred Trial No. 125 and Criminal Appeal No. 499 of 1937, Decided on 16th November 1937, referred by Sess. Court, Anantapur, D/- 9th September 1937.

(a) Criminal Trial—Evidence—Post-mortem certificate taken by itself is not substantive evidence — Isolated statement in it cannot without guidance of doctor be used for drawing inferences.

A post-mortem certificate is not evidence. It can be used by the doctor who has given it to refresh his memory when giving evidence and it can also be used as a record of what he observed at the time of post-mortem examination or perhaps to contradict whatever he might say in the witness box but it cannot by itself be substantive evidence. [P 337 C 1]

Where there is a statement in the post-mortem certificate to the effect that some quantity of undigested kora food was found in the stomach of the deceased, it is unsafe for the Court to act upon an isolated statement of this kind, without the guidance of the opinion of the doctor and to draw an inference that death must have taken place within a very short time of the eating of the last meal by the deceased. [P 337 C 2]

(b) Murder—Evidence—Accused alleged to have murdered child — Sole fact proved against him that he was seen in company of child not far from where corpse was found and sometime before murder—Accused commonly seen with child previously — Accused held was not responsible for murder.

Where the sole fact proved against an accused charged with having murdered a child for the sake of his ornaments, is that he was seen in the company of the child not far away from where the corpse was found sometime before the murder must have taken place and there was nothing unusual in the little boy being in the company of the accused, it being a common occurrence and where it is not possible to say that accused and the child were seen together within a very short time of the murder it is not safe to infer that the accused must have been concerned in the murder. [P 338 C 1]

C. R. Pattabhiraman — for Accused.

Burn J.—The appellant has been convicted by the learned Sessions Judge of Anantapur for murdering a little boy on 18th February 1937 and has been sentenced to death. This is one of those sadly too frequent cases in which children are murdered for the sake of jewellery on them. There is no reason to distrust the evidence of the mother of the little boy (P. W. 1) who says that on the night of 18th February her little boy ran out to play after taking his evening meal, wearing a pair of gold bangles and a pair of gold earrings. When the little boy's corpse was found by the side of the donka leading from the village towards Dharmapuram, the jewels had been removed. The boy had been murdered apparently by dropping a large stone upon his head. Two blood-stained stones were found closeby, one weighing about one and half maunds and the other quite a small one. There can be no doubt but that the child was murdered in this brutal fashion for the sake of the jewels which he was wearing.

The evidence against the appellant which the Judge has accepted is wholly of a circumstantial nature. The appellant is said to be a eunuch, who is a native apparently of Malabar ; but the mother of the boy, (P. W. 1), says that he had been in the village of Vengannapalli in Gooty Taluq for the past 12 months. According to the evidence of P. Ws. 1, 2 and 3 the appellant was popular with the children of the village and that it was quite usual for them to play with him and to go hither and thither with him. P. W. 2 who lives about a furlong from the place where the body was found, said that she had seen the appellant and the little boy that night going in the direction of the place where the corpse was found. P. Ws. 3 and 4 said that sometime later they saw the appellant alone returning in the opposite direction. To all intents and purposes this is the whole of the evidence against the appellant. It was alleged by the village munsif, (P. W. 10) and another witness, (P. W. 11) that the appellant whom the village munsif found tied up near the temple, admitted that he had committed the offence and promised to show where he had put the jewels. The village munsif says that after the appellant made this statement, he got the appellant released. He says, the appellant and the other witnesses laid him to a place near the house of Vadde Nagabusi. There the appellant played a trick upon the village munsif. He requested the village munsif to keep the other people at a distance, while he and the village munsif alone went further. The village munsif fell into the trap, went along with the appellant but the appellant after pretending to look here and there ran away and the village munsif was unable to catch him. The village munsif is corroborated, as we have mentioned by P. W. 11. But it is to be noticed that

P. W. 11 is not a resident of Venganna-palli but of the village of Nemathabad, a hamlet of Gooty. No resident of the village speaks to this confession by the appellant and we think that the learned Sessions Judge was right in refusing to act upon this evidence of confession. It is curious that although the village Munsif found the appellant tied up when he got to the temple which was after midnight, there is no evidence to inform us when the appellant was caught or where.

The learned Sessions Judge had relied to a great extent upon a sentence in the post-mortem certificate (Ex. B) to the effect that the Sub-Assistant Surgeon found ten ounces of undigested kora food in the stomach of the little boy. The evidence of the mother (P. W. 1) is that she gave the little boy his evening meal and that he ran out at once to play. The evidence of P. W. 2 would show that the appellant and the deceased were seen together very soon after that and the fact that the food was still undigested—the learned Sessions Judge thinks—is an indication that the murder must have taken place within a very short time afterwards. For this reason, he thinks, that it is incumbent upon the appellant to produce a satisfactory explanation or to submit to the drawing of the inevitable inference that he was concerned in the murder. We cannot think that this reasoning of the learned Sessions Judge is sound. The Sub-Assistant Surgeon, when he gave evidence, was not asked anything about the state of the food in the stomach of the little boy. The learned Sessions Judge was not justified in treating the post-mortem certificate (Ex. B) as evidence and in extracting the sentence about the undigested food and relying upon that as if it were positive evidence in the case. The post mortem certificate is not evidence. It could be properly used by the Sub-Assistant Surgeon, when he was giving evidence, to refresh his memory and it could also be used as a record of what he observed at the time to corroborate, or perhaps to contradict, whatever he might say in the witness box; but it cannot by itself be substantive evidence. It is clear that it would be unsafe to act upon an isolated statement of this kind in a post-mortem certificate. If the Sub-Assistant Surgeon had brought out this fact in his deposition the appellant's advocate in the lower Court might have been able to cross-examine the Sub-Assistant Surgeon and to find out precisely what he meant by "undigested" food and also to find out his opinion as to the time that had elapsed between the taking of the last meal and the death of the little boy. It is common experience that the expression 'undigested food' may mean food which has been partially digested in the stomach but has not passed out of the stomach. We have had many cases in which doctors have given opinions that death must have taken place within a certain time after the taking of the last meal. But we do not think it is safe for a Sessions Judge without the guidance of the opinion of the doctor to take so decidedly a view that death must have taken place within a very short time of the eating of the last meal.

There was one other circumstance, which appeared in Ex. A, a statement made by the mother of the boy to the village munsif. That was that when she got to the temple in her search for the child, she saw the appellant and questioned him. She says he replied "Your son Narayanan is not here." The learned Public Prosecutor has pointed out that if it were true that the appellant had been seen in the company of the little boy very shortly before, this conduct on his part shortly after the murder would be very suspicious. For some reason which we do not know, this part of P. W. 1's statement to the village munsif was not brought out in the Sessions Court. In the Sessions Court she said that she saw the appellant at the temple but not that she spoke to him or that he spoke to her. The appellant has offered an explanation of the evidence of the Village Munsif in so far as it relates to his escape from the Village munsif. He says that it is quite true that he promised to show the place where the jewels were buried but that he only did that because he was tied to a post and was being beaten and he wanted to get an opportunity of escaping. There can be no doubt that this is a possible and in fact a plausible explanation.

There was another person accused along with the appellant, one Vankataramudu son of Vadde Nagabusi already mentioned. It is in the evidence of the police that accused 2 was arrested on information given by the appellant and that accused 2 when arrested had some blood spots on his clothes. But nothing more was discovered against him and the police did not think it worthwhile to include him in the charge sheet. He was committed for trial at the instance of the Sub. Magistrate, who thought it proper that he should be tried along with the appellant. The appellant in his petition of appeal from jail alleges that it was really accused 2 who committed the crime and that accused 2 has been protected by the village munsif and other people of the village, while he (the appellant) has been sacrificed as he is a poor, helpless stranger. It is not necessary to express any opinion with regard to the guilt of accused 2, but it is quite clear that he could not have been convicted upon the evidence, that was adduced in the case.

With regard to the appellant we think that the evidence does not lead to the necessary inference that he must have been concerned in the murder of the little boy Narayanan. As we have already said, the sole fact proved against him is that he was seen in the company of the child not far away from where the corpse was found, sometime before the murder must have taken place. But there was nothing unusual in the fact that the little boy was with the appellant; that was a common occurrence. And as it is not possible to say that the appellant and the child were seen together within a very short time of the murder, we do not think it safe in this case to infer that the appellant must have been concerned in the murder. There is undoubtedly cause for grave suspicion, but we think the evidence falls short of proof. We therefore allow this appeal and set aside the conviction for murder and the sentence of death and direct that the appellant be set at liberty forthwith.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 91 — Channel constructed through village site—Public nuisance —Special damages not proved—Suit must be with permission of Advocate-General.

The construction of a channel through village site is nothing more than a common nuisance and unless special damages are established, the only manner in which a common nuisance can be abated is by a suit to be brought under S. 91 with the permission of the Advocate General : 6 I C 419 and 35 All 197, Disting. [P 338 C 2; P 339 C 1]

Judgment. — The defendants have been found by the lower Appellate Court to have dug a channel through a part of the village site, and that portion of the channel which passes through the village site also runs in front of the house of the plaintiffs and lies between their house and the well. The plaintiffs have therefore brought this suit on behalf of the village community for a mandatory injunction requiring the defendants to block up that part of the channel which lies within the village site. The only point argued in appeal is whether the suit is maintainable. I do not think there can be any doubt that the plaintiffs can have no cause of action unless they suffered special damage from the construction of this channel; and I do not consider that the construction of this channel is anything more than a common nuisance. It seems to me equally clear that the only manner in which a common nuisance can be abated is for a suit to be brought under S 91, Civil P. C., with the permission of the Advocate General. It has been argued in support of the judgment of the lower Court that the whole community of the village could bring a suit for the abatement of this nuisance; but I do not find any authority for that contention. 1910 M W N 443[1] has been cited as an instance where a village community were allowed to sue where a certain person wrongfully cultivated a part of the village natham; but that case can be distinguished as it appears that the whole village, including the village site, was held by the ryots themselves and not, as ordinarily, by the Government or zamindar, when the Government becomes the trustee on behalf of the villagers for the protection and care of property ordinarily described as communal property. 35 All 197[2] is another case on which the respondents rely and was an instance where certain Mahomedans were prevented from worshipping in a mosque because it had been alienated to a Hindu; and it was held that a suit was maintainable by individual Mahomedans because each of them had a right to worship in that mosque and if his right was interfered with he had a right to sue. It has been pointed out that there was no public right to worship in that mosque, the right belonging to every one of the numerous members of a particular community. 35 All 197[2] has therefore to distinguished on that ground. The only remedy for a member of the public who is inconvenienced by a nuisance but has suffered no special damage from it is therefore to seek the permission of the Advocate-General under S. 91, Civil P. C.

A point has incidentally been raised in this appeal as an Additional reason why the lower Appellate Court should not have granted the mandatory injunction prayed for and that is the great delay in bringing the suit. As to that, I find that no objection was raised on that ground in the written statement or in the grounds of appeal in the lower Appellate Court; and I am not therefore prepared to listen to it now. In spite of the fact that the plaintiffs were not entitled to bring the suit or to proceed with it without the permission of the Advocate General, I do not think that the decree of the lower Appellate Court should be set aside on that ground in view of the fact that this objection was not expressly taken in the Courts below. The defendants allowed the suit and the first appeal to proceed without clearly raising this technical objection. I do not see why, in view of the fact that S. 91, Civil P. C., does not actually prohibit the filing of a suit unless the Advocate-General consents, the absence of the consent of the Advocate-General should not be the subject of a waiver by the defendants. It is true of course that if S. 91, Civil P. C had said that no suit should be filed with regard to a common nuisance without the consent of the Advocate-General, such an objection as has here been taken could be raised at any stage; as it would be a statutory bar to the filing of the suit. But S. 91 is not so worded. It runs :

> Two or more persons having obtained the consent in writing of the Advocate-General, may institute a suit though no special damage has been caused; and I think this difference in the wording has the effect that a mere failure to obtain the permission of the Advocate-General would not render a suit not maintainable if no objection is taken by the other side. I do not think, it would be equitable to allow the defendants to raise a plea at this stage after the plaintiffs have gone through the expense and trouble of conducting the suit and defending it in appeal. Both the Courts below treated the suit by the plaintiffs as one representing the community; and as the defendant seemed content that the suit should proceed upon the footing that it was a representative suit, the decree should not be set aside merely on the ground that the permission of the Advocate-General was not obtained. The appeal is therefore dismissed with costs.

Madras Estates Land Act (1 of 1908), S. 3 (2) (d) (as amended by Act 18 of 1936) — Words in S. 3 (2) (d) as amended in 1936 should be read as if they were present in Act of 1908.

To the categories that under the 1908 Act, were estates, was added, as it were, another category by the amendment of S. 3 (2) (d) and the words in the amended Section should be read as if they were present throughout in the earlier and unamended Act Hence what is estate under the new definition of the word "estate", must be deemed to have always and throughout been an estate. [P 340 C 2]

B. Somayya — for Appellants.

Venkatasubba Rao J.—The question raised is, how these Letters Patent appeals that were stayed, are now to be disposed of. The suits were brought for the recovery of rent in respect of lands situated in a shrotriam, and it was pleaded inter alia that the village was an estate within the meaning of Act I of 1908 and that the District Munsif's Court where the suits were filed had no jurisdiction. Both the Courts below have found that the shrotriam in question is not an estate as defined by S. 3 (2) (d) of the Act mentioned and have accordingly passed a decree for a certain amount. This decision of the lower Courts was confirmed by Madhavan Nair J. and it is his judgment that is attacked in these Letters Patent appeals. An application was made, while they were pending, under S. 127, Madras Act 8 of 1934, that they should be stayed, presumably upon the ground that the appeals were "proceedings involving a decision whether or not the inamdar has the kudivaram right" in the suit lands: see S. 127 (2). The Letters Patent appeals were accordingly stayed and now that the Amending Act 18 of 1936 has been passed, they are posted before us for disposal.

The appellants (defendants) urge that the plaints should be returned for presentation to the Revenue Court; that, it is contended, is the right order to make in the circumstances that have happened. Mr. Raghava Rao for the plaintiffs disputes this proposition. That the suit village is an inam under the amended definition does not admit of question and indeed Mr. Raghava Rao admits it. But his argument is that the suit was in respect of an amount due for the years 1920-1922, i. e. before the coming into force of the 1936 Act. Then he turns to the definition of "landholder" and urges that the expression means a person owning an estate or part thereof, and goes on to contend that his client did not own an estate when the amount claimed became due, for the shrotriam, he says, became an estate for the first time by reason of the 1936 Act. In support of his argument he relies on Explanation (2), newly added to S. 6 which contains the words :

> In relation to an inam village which was not an estate before the commencement of the Madras Estates Land (Third Amendment) Act, 1936, but became an estate by virtue of that Act.

On the strength of those words, he says that the Legislature must be taken to have intended to enact that the extended definition was to come into effect only from the date of the amending Act, in other words, the amended S. 3 (2) (d) cannot be treated as declaratory or having a retrospective effect but that the newly added categories should be treated as estates only from the date of the Act. Having regard to the scope and policy of the Amending Act, we are not prepared to hold that that is the proper construction to put upon the amended Section. To the categories that under the 1908 Act, were estates, was added, as it were, another category, by the amendment of Section 3 (2) (d), and the words should be read as if they were present throughout in the earlier and unamended Act. S. 13 of Act 18 of 1936 provides that all proceedings stayed under S. 127 of the 1934 Act shall be disposed of, as if the Act of 1908 as amended by the 1934 and 1936 Acts, had been in force at the original institution of the said proceedings. True, says Mr. Raghava Rao:

> In virtue of this Section I should be treated as a landholder on the date of my suits. But at the time the cause of action arose, i. e. 1920-1922, I was not a landholder because the village was not an estate on those dates.

This argument, as already shown, is wrong, as in our opinion by reason of the new definition of the word "estate" the village must be deemed to have always and throughout been an estate. Mr. Raghava Rao's contention raises a question of far-reaching importance. If his argument is correct, a suit for rent, say for 1934-1935, would lie in a Civil Court, for according to him that would be the competent Court to try the claim. Such a result, it seems to us, is not the one contemplated by the amendment. The proper order therefore in our opinion is to direct the plaints to be returned for presentation to the proper Court, i. e. the Revenue Court. In the Letters Patent appeals we make no order as to costs.

B. Sitarama Rao and P. S. Narayanaswami Iyer — for Appellants.

Judgment. — Mr. Sitarama Rao has raised two contentions in this second appeal : (1) the plaintiff.respondent is not entitled to claim any maintenance from and out of the estate of her deceased husband, and (2) the rate awarded both for arrears of and future maintenance is excessive. It may be necessary to state a few facts for dealing with the first contention. The plaintiff is the widow of one Ramayya Ayyar who is the adopted son of one N. Venkateswara Ayyar. The said Ramayya Ayyar died on 12th April 1923 leaving him surviving his widow the plaintiff, his adoptive mother, Ramalakshmi Ammal, who is no other than the mother of the plaintiff's natural mother and a last will and testament dated 8th April 1923. In and by the said will he bequeathed all the property which he then owned and possessed to both his mother and his wife the plaintiff. To his mother he gave property worth about Rs. 7000 namely, a certain land and a house; to his wife he gave certain lands worth about Rs. 1600. He directed his mother to discharge the debts left by him which were ascertained after his death to be about a sum of Rs. 1192. This suit was filed by the plaintiff for a declaration that the will was not true or at any rate was not made by the testator in a sound and disposing state of mind and even assuming it to be genuine, her right to maintenance cannot be taken away by the said will. Both the Courts have concurrently found that the will was genuine and was made by the testator in a sound and disposing state of mind, and I see no reason to differ from the said finding. The learned District Munsif, in addition to the property bequeathed by the testator to the plaintiff, allowed her a sum of Rs. 150 as and for future maintenance from the date of plaint. He also awarded arrears at that rate and mesne profits from the lands bequeathed to her which were in the possession of defendants 1 to 3, defendant 1, Ramalakshmi Ammal and defendants 2 and 3, being her daughters, who were on the date of suit in possession of the properties left by the testator under a settlement deed executed by defendant 1.

It is contended on behalf of the defendants.appellants that as the testator made a specific gift of certain lands in favour of the plaintiff and she had elected to retain the said property, it is not open to her to claim any maintenance. I am not inclined to agree with the contention. The right to maintenance possessed by a Hindu widow cannot be taken away by any disposition made by her husband and a donee under a will is bound to provide for her maintenance. This rule of Hindu law cannot be disputed. But what is contended is that the gift of property made by the testator in this case must be deemed to be in lieu of maintenance and so long as the will stands, she cannot have the lands and at the same time claim maintenance. But there is no indication in the will that the gift was made in lieu of maintenance. The only question would be, the husband having made a provision to the widow, was that provision sufficient or should the donees other than the widow be compelled also to contribute to her maintenance. The entire property including that taken by the plaintiff is liable for maintenance and so the property taken by her will have to be taken into consideration in arriving at the rate of maintenance to be fixed for her. There is therefore nothing to preclude the plaintiff from retaining the property and claiming also maintenance. What the lower Courts have found is that the income that she would derive from the property bequeathed to her under the will would not be sufficient to maintain her and therefore she would be entitled to have additional amount provided for her maintenance.

Mr. Sitarama Rao contends that the learned Subordinate Judge in awarding the rate of maintenance has not taken into consideration that the mother, defendant 1 was directed to discharge the debts left by the testator and the kist payable on the lands. Having heard learned counsel on the question of rate, in view of the fact that the mother was directed to discharge the debts left by the testator and having also regard to the fact that the property given to the plaintiff was given to her with absolute rights, I think the award of a sum of Rs. 150 both for past and future maintenance is a little too high. Having regard to the circumstances of this case, I would modify the decree of the lower Appellate Court thus: In regard to the maintenance payable in future, the defendants do deliver 20 kalams of paddy and pay Rs. 25 in cash every year on or before 1st of April every year. In regard to the past arrears upto date, I would substitute for Rs. 150 a sum of Rs. 120 per annum. The decree for mesne profits as made by the lower Courts will stand. The plaintiff will also be entitled to the land bequeathed to her under her husband's will and she will enjoy the same with absolute rights. I direct each party to bear his or her own costs of this second appeal. The memorandum of objections is dismissed but without costs.

Second Appeal No. 848 of 1932, Decided on 8th December 1937, against decree of Dist. Court, East Godavari at Rajahmundry, in A. S. No. 81 of 1930.

(a) Madras Estates Land Act (1 of 1908), Ss. 24, 30 — S. 24 should be read along with S. 30 - Enhancement of rent - Water taken by tenant without landlord's permission — Rent charged by landlord for water—Suit for such rent is under S. 77.

S. 24 must be read in conjunction with S. 30 and Chap. 11 They contain the only provisions for enhancement of rent. S. 3 (11) in effect says that money payable for water taken without permission shall be deemed to be rent. Therefore it can be recovered as such and if such water is charged for, it does not amount to an enhancement of the rent within the meaning of the statute. The claim being one for rent within the meaning of S. 3 (11), the Civil Court is closed to the landlord and the claim can only be enforced by proceedings instituted under S. 77. The fact that the landlord sought to recover something extra for water taken by his tenants does not mean that he was suing for enhanced rent within the meaning of S. 24: A I R 1935 Mad 1073 Expl; A I R 1919 Mad 236, Rel. on. [P 345 C 2; P 346 C 1]

(b) Madras Estates Land Act (1 of 1908), S. 24—Enhancement - Parties not contemplating increase of rent—Tenant taking water without landlord's permission—Landlord can charge excess rent for water so used — Such rent does not amount to enhancement.

The fact that the parties did not contemplate an increase in rent in the ordinary way does not preclude the landlord from requiring his tenants to pay for something taken without his permission. Where the tenants took the water behind the back of their landlord, the former must pay for it. The law says that it may be recovered as rent and such excess recovery does not amount to enhancement. K. Subramaniam for Advocate-General — for Respondent No. 1.

Order of Reference

Venkataramana Rao J.—This second appeal arises out of an action by a landlord to recover rent from a ryot holding a certain land under him. Two points have been argued by Mr. Suryanarayana in this second appeal. One is based on the construction of the patta under which the tenant holds and the second is based on S. 30, Madras Estates Land Act. In regard to the first point, the contention is put thus. The land is held on what is known as Nimebadi tenure and that under Cl. 4 of the patta the landlord is not entitled to claim any extra sum in addition to what is provided therein. The claim is made by way of a charge for water for raising wet crops on dry lands in addition to the dry rate mentioned in the patta for three faslis. What is known as "Nimebadi lands" is defined in Ex. 3 thus :

The expression 'Nimebadi' as used and understood by the Rajah and ryots of the Pithapuram Estate connotes lands granted on favourable rent which is lower than the lawful rate previously payable on them or upon lands of similar description and with similar advantage in the neighbourhood.

Therefore clause 4 in the patta only means that so long as the tenant raises dry crops on the land, the landlord is not entitled to charge any extra rent on any account whatever. But once the tenant raises wet crops on the dry land, clause 4 would not apply.

The second contention raises a question of some importance : Where in a particular year the tenant raises wet crops on dry land with the use of the landlord's water and if the landlord claims water rate for the use of such water in addition to the dry rate, can this extra claim be construed as an enhancement of rent so as to attract the provisions of S. 30, Estates Land Act? In 42 Mad 702,[1] their Lordships, Phillips and Kumaraswami Sastri JJ., were inclined to hold that it would not amount to an enhancement of rent : vide the observations at pp. 706 and 707. In a recent decision in 59 Mad 5,[2] Venkatasubba Rao J. doubts the correctness of this decision at p. 31 where referring to it he observes thus :

> I fail to see how an extra charge for water, when wet crops are raised on dry land, having regard to the implications of S. 30 does not amount to an enhancement.

On the other hand, Ramesam J. does not seem to dissent from this decision; in fact, he rather approves it. At p. 15 the learned Judge remarks thus :

> It was there held (referring to the decision in 42 Mad 702,[1]) that a charge for taking water belonging to the landlord is 'rent' and it is not enhancement of rent even if not consolidated with the rent proper. I agree with this proposition.

I may in this connexion refer to the observations of the learned Chief Justice in 70 M L J 494[3] at pp. 496 and 497. I think it is desirable that this question should be considered by a Bench and I accordingly refer the case for disposal by a Bench I have not considered the other questions which may arise on the decision of this question and the same will also be dealt with by the Bench.

(The appeal having been directed to be posted before a Full Bench and coming on for hearing yesterday and this day, the Court delivered the following judgment.)

Leach C. J. — This appeal arises out of a suit filed before the Deputy Collector, Cocanada, under S. 77, Madras Estates Land Act, 1908, by the Maharajah of Pithapuram, to recover from the appellant and 5 other tenants an aggregate of sum of Rs. 11.1.4 for water taken by them without his permission from his tank for the purpose of raising wet crops on dry lands in Faslis 1336, 1337 and 1338. Para. 5 of the plaint, which is in Telugu, has been translated as follows :

> The defendants have no right whatever to use the said water for the jirayati dry lands in the aforesaid manner. As the defendants use the said water unjustly, the amount of Rs 9-15 7 as per particulars hereunder towards Tirva and cesses thereon, with interest (was due) and in spite of several demands by the plaintiff's officials, both oral and written, the defendants did not pay as mentioned above.

The difference between this sum of Rs. 9.15 7 and Rs. 11.1.4 represents the claim for interest. The main lines of defence were : (1) the Revenue Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit as it was a suit in tort ; (2) even if it could be treated as a suit for rent, it could not be maintained as it amounted to a claim for enhanced rent contrary to the provisions of the Act; and (3) the terms of the patta precluded the plaintiff seeking extra rent. The appellant denied that the water belonged to the plaintiff and alleged that he had used it for only one Fasli 1338, and then not on dry lands The Deputy Collector dismissed the suit holding that the water belonged to the defendants and that the terms of the patta precluded the plaintiff from claiming any enhanced rent. An appeal followed to the District Judge of East Godawari, who held that the tank did belong to the plaintiff and that water had been used for the three Faslis mentioned in the plaint on dry lands belonging to the defendants. With regard to the pleas that the Revenue Court had no jurisdiction and that the suit as framed was bad he held that the Civil Court had jurisdiction and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. He disallowed the claim that the terms of the patta precluded any enhancement of rent. The findings of fact of the District Judge are conclusive and therefore before us the appeal has been confined to the three main questions. The appellant was defendant 6 and he alone has appealed.

With regard to the contention that the suit is in reality a suit to recover damages for tort, it should be borne in mind that it was instituted under the provisions of S. 77 of the Act which relates only to recovery of arrears of rent. S. 3 (11) defines "rent" as meaning whatever is lawfully payable in money or in kind or in both to a landholder by a ryot for the use or occupation of land for the purpose of agriculture and includes whatever is lawfully payable on account of water supplied by the landholder or taken without his permission for cultivation of land where the charge for water has not been consolidated with the charge for the use or occupation of the land. Therefore rent includes what is payable for water taken without permission. The suit being a suit under S. 77 and being for the recovery of the value of water taken without permission, we consider that it must be treated as a suit for rent and not a suit in tort. The word "unjustly" was introduced obviously as meaning without right.

The answer to the question whether the suit is maintainable depends on the meaning to be given to the word "enhanced" in S. 24 of the Act which says "The rent of a ryot shall not be enhanced except as provided by this Act." The appellant says that it is a suit for enhancement of rent and as the rent has not been enhanced in accordance with the provisions of the Act it cannot be maintained. The provisions of the statute which permit of enhancement are confined to S. 30 and to Ch. 11, which relates to the resettlement of rents. S. 30 permits applications to be made by landholders for enhancement of rents in special circumstances. There are four grounds on which a landholder can apply under this section. Under sub.s. (1), the landholder may apply to the Collector to enhance the rent on the ground that during the currency of the existing rent there has been a rise in the average local prices of staple food crops in the taluk or zamindari division. Sub.s. (ii) gives him the right of applying when during the currency of the existing rent the productive powers of the land have been increased by an improvement effected by him or at his expense. Sub-s. (iii) permits him to apply when a work of irrigation or other improvement has been executed at the expense of Government, and he has been lawfully required to pay in respect of the holding an additional revenue or rate to Government in consequence. Sub.s. (iv) allows him to apply when the productive powers of the land have been increased by fluvial action.

The learned advocate for the appellant has argued that the plaintiff could have applied under sub-section (ii) of S. 30 for enhancement of rent, and if he had done so and obtained an order increasing the rent in respect of the three years the suit would have been in order, but as he has not secured an enhancement under this section the suit does not lie. This however is not a case of a landlord attempting to recover a higher rent because of any improvement effected by him or at his expense. S. 3 (4) defines "improvement" as meaning with reference to a ryot's holding any work which materially adds to the value of the holding, which is suitable to the holding, and consistent with its character, and which, if not executed on the holding is either executed directly for its benefit or after execution is made directly beneficial to it. Here the landlord did not construct the tank for the benefit of the defendants or for the improvement of their lands. The water in the tank was intended for other tenants and his claim was that the defendant tenants had taken the water without his permission. In other words they had taken advantage behind his back of a work which was intended for other people. It is therefore not open to the appellant to say that the plaintiff ought to have taken advantage of S. 30 before instituting the suit. There were no circumstances which would permit of an application under S. 30.

Before referring to the authorities on the question of what is enhancement, I might point out that S. 189 of the Act defines the jurisdiction of the Collector. The details of the suit and applications which a Collector shall hear and determine are set out in Parts A and B of the schedule. Item 3 in Part A is a suit by a landholder to recover arrears of rent. The second clause of S. 189 states that 'no Civil Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction shall take cognizance of any dispute or matter in respect of which a suit or application might be brought or made in the Revenue Court. Therefore, this being a suit for rent within the meaning of the Act it could only be instituted before the Collector. The meaning of the word 'enhanced' has been the subject of much discussions in this Court. The discussion started when the Rent Recovery Act, 1865, was in force and has been continued since this Act was replaced by the Madras Estates Land Act. The earliest case to which we have been referred is that in 10 Mad 282,[4] where the question was whether the landlord had a right to charge water-cess when a wet crop was cultivated on dry land or when a second wet crop was cultivated on wet land. It was not denied there that water for these purposes had been taken from the proprietor's tank, and it was held that the landlord was entitled to call upon the tenant to pay for the extra water and that this did not constitute an increase in rent.

In that case there was no discussion in the judgment on the meaning of 'enhancement', but the matter was referred to in argument. A similar decision was given in 12 M L J 22[5] by White C. J., and Davies J. in 42 Mad 702.[1] Phillips and Kumaraswami Sastri JJ., held that a charge for taking landlord's water is 'rent' within the meaning of S. 3 (11), Estates Land Act, and does not constitute an enhancement of rent. A Full Bench of this Court consisting of Ramesam, Wallace and Jackson JJ. considered the question in 51 Mad 266.[6] In this case a ryot had used for the purpose of cultivating his land water from a tank belonging to Government, and Government required the landlord to pay for the water taken by the ryot. The landlord then sought to recover from the ryot what he had been compelled to pay to Government, and the question was whether this was a claim for enhancement of rent within the meaning of S. 24. The reference to the Full Bench was made by Srinivasa Ayyangar and Curgenven JJ., and I will quote a passage from the judgment of Srinivasa Ayyangar J. which shows in precise terms what is meant by the expression 'enhancement of rent':

> The expression 'enhancement of rent' in ordinary English parlance may apply to two different things: firstly, to any increase in the amount payable by the tenant to the landlord in relation to the holding, and secondly, to a larger amount being required to be paid by the tenant to the landlord in respect of the very things that a tenant has been previously enjoying and without any further advantages. Logically speaking, it is only the latter that can be regarded as constituting a real enhancement of rent. If in the place of half a dozen rooms in a flat the tenant comes to occupy two more rooms and the rent is proportionately increased, it cannot, properly speaking, be called an enhancement of rent; similarly, if the rent of the tenant should be increased, let us say for electric lights installed in the house by the landlord.

In deciding the reference Ramesam and Wallace JJ. held that the claim was not a claim for enhancement within the meaning of the Section. Jackson J. dissented and in doing so expressed the opinion that the enhancement might vary from year to year. This would however conflict with the scheme and the provisions of the Act. There can only be an enhancement under S. 30 or under Ch. 11. S. 30, as I have pointed out, deals with special circumstances under which a landlord may apply, but when he applies and the application is granted, the order of the Collector fixes the rent which is to be paid by the tenant in the future, and he will be liable to pay it until it is altered either by a fresh application under S. 30 or, as the result of a resettlement of rents under Ch. 11. A case on which the appellant has placed reliance is that of 59 Mad. 5[2], which was decided by Ramesam and Venkatasubba Rao JJ. There Venkatasubba Rao J. said (p. 31):

> I fail to see how an extra charge for water, when wet crops are raised on dry land, having regard to the implications of S. 30, does not amount to an enhancement, and he discussed this question at considerable length. The appeal, however, did not call for a decision on the question because the evidence showed that the water was Government water, and consequently the tenant could not be required to pay any increased rent. Therefore the remarks of the learned Judge on this question must be regarded as obiter dicta. Ramesam J. accepted the view which found favour in 42 Mad 702,[1] and with great respect for all that was said by Venkatasubba Rao J. we consider this view to be right. The question is whether the word 'enhanced' is to be given its dictionary meaning or whether it is to be given a special meaning so far as S. 24 is concerned. This difficulty could have been avoided by more careful drafting but we have got to consider the Act as it is. In our opinion S. 24 must be read in conjunction with S. 30 and Chap. 11. They contain the only provisions for enhancement of rent. S. 3 (11) in effect says that money payable for water taken without permission shall be deemed to be rent. Therefore it can be recovered as such and the authorities show that if such water is charged for, it does not amount to an enhancement of the rent within the meaning of the statute. The claim being one for rent within the meaning of S. 3 (11) the Civil Court was closed to the plaintiff and the claim could only be enforced by proceedings instituted under S. 77. We hold that it was properly instituted and that the fact that the plaintiff sought to recover something extra for water taken by his tenants during the three years mentioned in the plaint does not mean that he was suing for enhanced rent within the meaning of S. 24.

5. Venkata Rao v. Vaithilinga Udayan, (1902) 12 M L J 22.

6. Doraisami Gurukkal v. Subramania Gurukkal, (1928) 15 A I R Mad 419 = 108 I C 625 = 51 Mad 266=54 M L J 361 (F B).

The argument that the terms of the patta precluded the plaintiff from instituting the suit must also be rejected. It is true that para. 4 of the patta states:

> It is settled that you should on no account demand a reduction or remission of cist either on account of excess inam or want of rain or for any other reason and that I should on no account enhance the cist at any time on the said kamatham (holding) but when the patta was drawn up it was never contemplated that the tenants would take water from the landlord's tank without his permission. The fact that the parties did not contemplate an increase in rent in the ordinary way does not preclude the landlord from requiring his tenants to pay for something taken without his permission. The tenants took the water behind the back of their landlord and must pay for it. The law says that it may be recovered as rent and that is what the plaintiff sought to do in the suit out of which this appeal arises. It follows that we consider that the decision of the learned District Judge is correct and that the plaintiff is entitled to hold the decree granted to him. It has however been brought to our notice, that the appellant was in fact a tenant for only one fasli (1338), and he will be only liable personally in respect of that year. The rent for three years will of course be a charge on the land. The decree will be modified to this extent. The appeal having failed, the respondent is entitled to his costs.

Varadachariar J. — I agree. I only wish to add a few words in respect of an observation in 33 M L J 355,[7] which has given rise to some criticism in later cases. The principle was there enunciated that where new circumstances have come into existence which require new adjustment there is no question of enhancement. If I may say so with due respect to the learned Judges, there was no difficulty in applying this principle to the facts of the case then before them, but the generality of the language used in the observation gives room for criticism. As has been pointed out in later decisions, the case contemplated in S. 30 (2) may well be held to fall within the general language employed by the learned Judges. The same difficulty arises with reference to the passage in the referring judgment of Srinivasa Ayyangar J. quoted by my Lord in the judgment just delivered. It therefore appears to me that the term "enhancement" as used in the Madras Estates Land Act should not be understood either in its etymological sense or even in the sense explained in 33 M L J 355,[7] but in the light of the history of the decisions, bearing upon the point in this presidency. As shown in the judgment just delivered, it was well settled under the Rent Recovery Act of 1865 that the landlord was entitled to claim extra payment when a tenant used the landlord's water for raising a wet crop on dry land or a second crop on a single crop wet land. As a matter of procedure, it had also been recognized that a claim of this kind would not amount to an enhancement which required the sanction of the Collector under the old Act. When Act 1 of 1908 was enacted, the Legislature seems to have accepted this view of the law both as to the right of the landlord as well as to the necessity for the Collector's sanction. It is only in respect of advantages which might be said to have brought about a new state of things that proceedings under S. 30 were contemplated and not for temporary advantages which at his option the tenant might have enjoyed by the use of the landlord's water in a manner which he had no right to do. The combined result was achieved by carrying the substance of the proviso to S. 11 of the old Act into S. 30 and by embodying the effect of the previous case law in the definition of 'rent' in S. 3 (11) of the Act. The very way in which the definition is framed clearly implies that prima facie such a payment will not be included in the conception of rent ; but for the purpose of facilitating the recovery of the same by the landlord, and also with a view to encourage such user instead of regarding it as an illegal or prohibited act, the Legislature preferred to embody the effect of the case law by giving an extended definition to the term " rent " in the new Act. It is true that as pointed out by Venkatasubba Rao J., 7. Appanna v. Venkataramalinganna Bhadur, (1918) 5 A I R Mad 563=42 I C 464=33 M L J 355.

in 59 Mad 5,[2] the extension of the definition will not of itself give a right to the zamindar to impose a charge but the zamindar was assumed to have the right as declared in the older cases and the definition was so framed only to indicate the manner in which the zamindar was entitled to recover it. The distinction between payment for temporary advantages of this kind and payment of an enhanced rent in the real sense contemplated in the Act is clearly brought out, if I may say so, in the judgment in 70 M L J 494[3] at p. 497. In the former case, the basic rent remains the same and the tenant is entitled at his option to take the water or not ; in the latter case, the basic rent itself is raised and the tenant will continue to be liable to pay the higher rate of rent whether he cultivates the land or not and whether he takes the water or not, unless he takes steps in the manner provided for in S. 32 (3) to get the rent reduced.

I wish to add a word about another point raised by Mr. Suryanarayana, namely that the zamindar will be entitled, even under the older decisions, to claim payment when water is taken from his tank only if there is a contract express or implied between the parties providing for such payment. It is no doubt true that in many cases there used to be a clause to this effect in the pattas, providing for the contingency of the tenant taking water from the landlord's tank for raising wet crop on dry land or a second crop on a single crop wet land, but I cannot accede to the contention that the zamindar's right is limited to such cases. The appellant's argument is no doubt supported to some extent by the observations of Srinivasa Ayyangar J., in A I R 1928 Mad 340 ;[8] but it is not easy to reconcile them with the express provision in the Act which contemplates a payment for the use of such water even when it is taken without the landlord's permission. It does not seem to me right to assume that the Legislature contemplates only a contractual right. Cases which may even be regarded as claims for damages on the ground of unlawful use of water are equally within the terms of the Section ; the Legislature preferred that even such claims should be treated as claims for " rent " instead of claims for damages, it being to the interest both of the landlord and of the tenant that such user should not be prohibited as tortious (cf. S. 45 of the Act of 1908 as to " rent " being payable even by a trespasser).

T. L. Venkatarama Iyer — for Petitioners.

K. Rajah Iyer — for Respondent.

Leach C. J.—The petitioners are brothers and constituted an undivided Hindu family. The first petitioner became of age in December 1931. The second petitioner was a minor when the proceedings out of which these petitions arise began. In 1925 the respondent was appointed guardian of the property of the petitioners. His appointment ceased on the first petitioner attaining majority in December 1931. On this event happening, the respondent filed a petition in the Court of the District Judge of Tinnevelly asking that he be discharged from his guardianship. Thereupon the petitioners filed two counter petitions. In one they asked the Court to assign the bond which had been executed as security for the respondent's stewardship and the other was for an order directing his accounts to be audited. The respondent's petition was granted, but the petitioners' applications were both dismissed. This Court is now asked, in the exercise of its powers under S. 115, Civil P. C., to set aside the order of the District Judge discharging the respondent and his order refusing to direct the bond to be assigned to the first petitioner. No application has been filed against the order dismissing the petition asking for an audit. The answer to the question before us depends on the construction to be placed on S. 41 (4) Guardians and Wards Act, 1890. Sub-s. (2) of that Section states that the powers of a guardian of the property of a minor cease (a) by his death, removal or discharge; (b) by the Court of Wards assuming superintendence of the property of the ward ; or (c) by the ward ceasing to be a minor. Sub-section (3) says :

> When for any cause the powers of a guardian cease, the Court may require him or, if he is dead, his representative to deliver as it directs any property in his possession or control belonging to the ward or any accounts in his possession or control relating to any past or present property of the ward.

Then comes sub-s. (4) which is worded as follows :

> When he has delivered the property or accounts as required by the Court, the Court may declare him to be discharged from his liabilities save as regards any fraud which may subsequently be discovered.

It will be observed that a guardian of the property of a minor ceases to be the guardian immediately on the ward coming of age. On this event happening, the Court may require the quondam guardian to deliver the property of the ward in his possession or control according to its direction and similarly require him to deliver the accounts which he has kept relating to past or present property of the ward. That is as far as the Court can go, both as regards the property and as regards the accounts. When the quondam guardian has complied with an order passed under sub-s. 3, the Court may in its discretion discharge him from his liability as guardian, save in respect of any fraud which may subsequently be discovered. In this case it was alleged that the respondent had been guilty of maladministration and an affidavit in support of this charge was filed. After considering this affidavit and giving it the weight which he considered it deserved, the learned District Judge came to the conclusion that the applications for the assignment of the bond and for an order directing an audit were frivolous and being of the opinion that the respondent was entitled to an order discharging him from liability granted his petition. It is said that in so doing the District Judge erred in law. It is argued that on a proper construction of sub-s. (4) the District Judge should, in view of the charge of maladministration, have refused the respondent his discharge and should have assigned the bond to the first petitioner. This is reading into sub-section (4) something which is not there. When the quondam guardian has complied with the directions of the Court under sub-s. 3 the Court has full discretion in the matter and can discharge him if it thinks fit. The learned District Judge did think that the respondent was entitled to his discharge and accordingly granted it. In so doing he exercised a jurisdiction vested in him, and it is not open to the petitioners to say that this Court in the exercise of its revisional powers can interfere with the order.

In 50 Mad 80[1] a Divisional Bench of this Court, consisting of Phillips and Madhavan Nair JJ. held that where a guardian has been discharged and has filed his accounts, the Court cannot hold an inquiry under the Act into the correctness of the accounts and determine the amount or the property in respect of which the guardian is accountable. The correctness of this decision has not been challenged; nor do we think it can be challenged. The same view was taken by the Calcutta High Court in 5 C W N 207.[2] This being so, all that the Court which appointed the guardian can do when the minor has come of age is to discharge him or refuse to discharge him. In the latter case the minor will be left to pursue his remedies against the quondam guardian by way of a suit. The Act provides no machinery by which an inquiry can be held under the Act once a guardian has ceased to function.

1. Subbarami Reddi v. Pattabhirama Reddi, (1926) 13 A I R Mad 977=97 I C 578=50 Mad 80=51 M L J 249.
2. Nabu Bepari v. Sheikh Mahomed, (1901) 5 C W N 207.

The proper course for a Court which has appointed a guardian of property to adopt on the minor coming of age is to refuse to grant a discharge if it appears that there is sufficient reason to keep open the question of the guardian's liability, and in this case to assign to the quondam minor the security bond. Similarly, if it considers that the guardian has acted properly throughout and no reasonable claim can be brought against him it should exercise the power which it has of discharging the guardian. In this case the learned District Judge has come to the conclusion that the respondent acted properly and has granted him discharge. Consequently the order is not open to question in revision proceedings. The two petitions before us will be dismissed and the respondent will be granted costs on one petition.

The words "when the plaintiff is acquitted" cannot be divorced from the words "or the prosecution is otherwise terminated". Where therefore a person who is prosecuted is either discharged or acquitted and the revision petition filed by the complainant against the discharge or acquittal is dismissed, the prosecution proceeding terminates only when the revision petition is dismissed and not on the discharge or acquittal. The limitation for a suit for malicious prosecution therefore begins to run from the dismissal of revision petition and not from the discharge or acquittal: A I R 1920 Mad 151, Approved: 23 Mad 24 Overruled. [P 352 C 1]

D. Ramaswamy Iyengar for C. S. Venkatachariar — for Appellants.

Leach C. J. — The respondent filed a complaint against the appellants before the bench of Magistrates of Saidapet, in which he accused the appellants of assault, insult and criminal intimidation. The charges against the 2nd appellant were dismissed on 23rd September 1930 and he was accordingly discharged. The case proceeded as against the first appellant and resulted in his acquittal on 25th May 1931. The respondent was not satisfied with the decision of the Magistrates and he filed two applications in revision, one against the discharge of the 2nd appellant and the other against the acquittal of the first appellant. These applications were filed in the Court of the District Magistrate of Chingleput and were heard by him. The hearing resulted in the dismissal of the petitions on 13th July 1931. On 12th July 1932 the appellants filed a suit in the Court of the District Munsif of Chingleput for damages for malicious prosecution. The District Munsif dismissed the suit on the ground that it was barred by the law of limitation and this decision was upheld on appeal by the District Judge of Chingleput. Therefore we are called upon to decide whether the suit was barred by Art. 23, Lim. Act. That Article fixes the period of limitation for a suit for malicious prosecution at one year and time begins to run "when the plaintiff is acquitted or the prosecution is otherwise terminated." In dismissing the appeal, the learned District Judge relied on the decision of this Court in 23 Mad 24[1] and on the decision in 47 Bom 28[2] and declined to follow the decision in 52 All 553.[3]

The case in 23 Mad 24[1] was an appeal decided by Subramania Aiyar and Moore

1. Narayya v. Seshayya, (1900) 23 Mad 24.

JJ. It arose out of a suit for damages for malicious prosecution, which had been instituted more than a year after the date of the acquittal, but within a year from the dismissal of a revision petition filed by the prosecutor against the acquittal. The learned Judges held that the period of limitation began to run when the appellant was acquitted, treating the order of acquittal as being final. In 47 Bom 28[3] Macleod C. J. and Kanga J. decided that the period of limitation ran from the date of the order of discharge on the ground that the cause of action would not be suspended because further proceedings might be taken either by the Government or by the complainant in order to get the order of discharge set aside. On the other hand in 52 All 553[3] the Allahabad High Court held that an application for revision of an order discharging an accused person could be deemed to be a continuation of the prosecution, or a fresh prosecution in itself, and therefore when the suit was instituted within one year of the dismissal of the application for revision it was in time, notwithstanding that more than 12 months had elapsed from the date of discharge. The learned Judges however remarked that in a case where the prosecution ended in acquittal, the language of Art. 23 left no room for argument with regard to the commencement of limitation, as the Article specifically provides that limitation is to run from the date of acquittal. We consider that in these cases the real significance of an application for revision has not been realized and we are unable to accept the Allahabad High Court's reading of Article 23.

Section 435, Criminal P. C., provides that the High Court or any Sessions Judge or District Magistrate or any Sub Divisional Magistrate empowered by the Local Government in this behalf, may call for and examine the record of any proceeding, before an inferior Criminal Court for the purpose of satisfying itself or himself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any finding, sentence or order recorded or passed, and as to the regularity of any proceedings of an inferior Court. Under S. 436 the District Magistrate may himself make or direct a Subordinate Magistrate to make further enquiry into a complaint which has been dismissed under S. 203 or sub.s. (3) of S. 204, or into the case of a person accused of an offence who has been discharged. S. 438 provides that the Sessions Judge or District Magistrate may, if he thinks fit, on examining under S 435 or otherwise the record of any proceeding, report for the orders of the High Court the result of his examination. These Sections are very widely drawn. S. 417 states that the Local Government may direct the Public Prosecutor to present an appeal to the High Court from an order of acquittal passed by any Court other than a High Court, but this Section does not limit the powers of a District Magistrate in calling for a record from a Subordinate Magistrate, and there is no Section in the Code of Criminal Procedure which does limit this right. Therefore it follows that if a District Magistrate considers that a person has been acquitted who should not have been acquitted, he can report the case to the High Court with a view to that Court exercising its powers of revision.

The learned advocate for the respondent in this connexion has laid great stress on R. 263 of the Criminal Rules of Practice and Orders of this Court. That rule states that when a District Magistrate is of opinion that an order of acquittal is wrong, and that such order should be set aside, he should request Government to prefer an appeal under S. 417, Criminal P. C. and should not report the case for the orders of the High Court under S. 438 of the Code. But this rule does not say that he shall not report such cases to the High Court for its orders. If it did, the rule would be ultra vires the powers of the Court. The rule has been framed for the guidance of District Magistrates in suitable cases, and cannot be read as saying that a District Magistrate shall never refer an acquittal to this Court. That the Court can revise an order of acquittal was recognized by a Full Bench of this Court consisting of Schwabe C. J., Oldfield and Coutts. Trotter JJ. in 45 Mad 913.[4] The learned Chief Justice in the course of his judgment pointed out that where there is an appeal by the Public Prosecutor or the Crown from an acquittal, the Court sets its face against revision; but where a private prosecutor, having no power to appeal comes to the Court in revision it certainly is open to the Court to hear him. The fact that in such a case the High Court seldom interferes does not mean that it will never interfere, and it has interfered in a suitable case, as is shown by the judgment of Wallace J. in 51 Mad 180.[5] The position therefore is this : the prosecutor may file an application before the District Magistrate for revision of an order of discharge or of acquittal passed by a Subordinate Magistrate and on such a petition being filed it will lead in a proper case to the setting aside of the order of discharge or of acquittal as the case may be. If the order of discharge is set aside, a further inquiry will be ordered and in the case where an order of acquittal is set aside a retrial will be directed.

The judgment of the Privy Council in 51 M L J 42[6] has great bearing on the questions now before us. The appellants in that case were accused with two others of murder. The appellants were discharged by the Magistrate who first dealt with the case, but the Sessions Judge called for the record and after notice to the appellants considered whether further enquiry should be ordered into the charge which had been preferred against them. After hearing the arguments the Sessions Judge came to the conclusion that the order of discharge had been properly passed and refused to commit the appellants for trial. The appeal to the Privy Council arose out of a suit which followed for damages for malicious prosecution. The appellants succeeded in the trial Court but on appeal to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh the judgment of the trial Court was reversed. The Appellate Court held that in an action for malicious prosecution the plaintiff has to prove (1) that he was prosecuted by the defendant; (2) that he was innocent of the charge upon which he was tried; (3) that the prosecution was instituted against him without any reasonable and probable cause; and (4) that it was due to a malicious intention of the defendant, and not with a mere intention of carrying the law into effect. Dealing with this statement Viscount Dunedin who delivered the judgment of the Judicial Committee observed :

> Proposition (2), as stated, is quite erroneous. It should be : "That the proceedings complained of terminated in favour of the plaintiff if from their nature they were capable of so terminating". This phraseology may be found in the judgment of Montague Smith J. in (1867) L R 2 C P 684[7] at p. 688. But the practice was in accordance with these words long before that case. Under the old forms of pleading a declaration if the law were really as the Judges in this case defined it, would, in all cases where there had not been an actual acquittal, have been bad if there were not added the statement that the plaintiff was innocent of the crime charged. The reports may be searched in vain for any declaration so found bad, though there were many cases where prosecution had terminated without acquittal. There was controversy as to what terminated proceedings as, e g, whether a nolle prosequi of the Attorney-General was a termination. But at any rate it was quite settled that a prosecution comes to end when a Magistrate declines to commit. . . Accordingly in Bullen and Leake's Precedents, 8th Edn. at p. 434, the regular form is given for an action for malicious prosecution when the plaintiff has been arrested and brought before a Magistrate. After narrating the arrest and the charge, it continues: "The said Justice having heard the said charge dismissed the same and discharged the plaintiff out of custody, whereupon the said proceedings terminated." In the present case it was sufficient for the appellants to prove, as they have done, that the criminal proceedings threatened on account of the disclosure contained in the confessions of Raghunath and Teja ended so far as they were concerned when the Sessions Judge finally refused to commit them for trial. That opened the way for the proof of the next proposition that the respondents had instigated the proceedings maliciously and without probable cause.

The Sessions Judge finally refused to commit the appellants for trial as the result of proceedings before him following the discharge by the Magistrate who held the inquiry. The principle which applies here was stated by Williams, Byles and Keating JJ. in (1861) 10 C B (N S) 592[8] at p. 604 in these words :

> It is a rule of law, that no one shall be allowed to allege of a still depending suit that it is unjust. This can only be decided by a judicial determination or other final event of the suit in the regular course of it. That is the reason given in the cases which established the doctrine, that, in actions for malicious arrest or prosecution, or the like, it is requisite to state in the declaration the determination of the former suit in favour of the plaintiff, because the want of probable cause cannot otherwise be properly alleged.

Now, when did the prosecution proceedings terminate in this case? We consider that the answer must be that they terminated on 13th July 1931 when the District Magistrate dismissed the revision petitions and that this answer is given by the decision in 51 M L J 42.[6] Until those petitions were dismissed the prosecution case was before the Court. And it seems to us that it does not lie in the mouth of the respondent prosecutor to say that the proceedings had terminated so far as appellant 2 was concerned on his discharge and so far as appellant 1 was concerned on his acquittal. The proceedings had not terminated, because he took further steps with a view to securing their conviction. The learned advocate for the respondent says that in any event the suit is barred so far as appellant 1 is concerned, as he was acquitted and Art. 23 provides that time shall run from the date of the acquittal. This argument ignores the wording of the Article and the reason for the rule that so long as proceedings are pending the accused shall not be allowed to sue The wording "when the plaintiff is acquitted" cannot be divorced from the words "or the prosecution is otherwise terminated". In our opinion the Article provides that time shall run when the plaintiff is acquitted or when the prosecution comes to an end in some other manner. If the acquittal is followed by other proceedings the prosecution is terminated not by the acquittal but by the order passed in the subsequent proceedings and this construction was placed on the Article by a Bench of this Court consisting, of Bakewell and Phillips JJ. in A I R 1920 Mad 151=57 I C 635[9]. It follows from what we have said that the case in 23 Mad. 24[1] was wrongly decided. The appeal will be allowed and the case remanded to the trial Court for decision on the merits. The appellant will be entitled to his costs in this Court and in the District Court. There will be a direction for the refund of court-fee both here and in the District Court.

Petition decided on 13th October 1937, for leave to appeal to Privy Council from judgment of Full Bench, D/. 29th April 1937, reported in A I R 1937 Mad 745 (F B).

 (b) Income-tax Act (1922), S. 66-A—In granting leave for appeal to Privy Council High Court cannot impose condition that appellant shall bear respondent's costs.

In granting leave for appeal to Privy Council, the High Court has no power to impose a condition that the appellant shall bear and pay the costs of the respondent: A I R 1923 Mad 232, Rel. on. [P 352 C 2; P 353 C 1]

(c) Civil P. C. An assessee carried on as a planter a large business in the Mysore State. The Income-tax authorities applied to the High Court for leave to appeal to the Privy Council from the decision of High Court on the effect of Proviso 2 to S. 4 (2), Income-tax Act. The actual amount of tax involved in the appeal was Rs. 3500.

Held that though the actual amount of the tax was Rs. 3500 the question would arise each year while the assessee remained in the business. Therefore in the end the amount of tax will be very considerable and hence application should be granted: A I R 1923 Mad 232, Disting. [P 353 C 1]

Leach C. J. — The Commissioner of Income-tax applies for a certificate permitting him to appeal to His Majesty-in-Council in respect of a decision of this Court on the effect of Proviso 2 to S. 4 (2), Income-tax Act. There can be no doubt that the question involved is a substantial question of law. As a matter of fact this Court placed a different interpretation on the proviso from that placed upon it by the Calcutta High Court. The application is however opposed by the respondent on the ground that an appeal to His Majesty-in-Council would put him to considerable expense. He contends that if leave is granted, it should be subject to the condition that the income-tax authorities pay his costs. It is quite clear that we have no power to impose any such condition and this was pointed out by this Court in 44 M L J 217.[1] Our powers are confined in this respect to those conferred by S. 66-A, Income-tax Act, and the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, which have been made applicable to such appeals. Their Lordships of the Privy Council have, on occasions, stipulated in granting special leave to appeal that the appellant shall bear the costs. But we have no such powers, as I have already indicated. When the appeal is heard in the Privy Council, their Lordships will then decide the question of costs.

The learned advocate for the respondent also says that leave should not be granted because the amount involved is less than Rs. 10,000. The actual amount of the tax in question is Rs. 3500. But the respondent carries on as a planter a large business in the Mysore State and the question will arise each year while he remains in this business. Therefore in the end the amount of tax will be very considerable. The learned advocate has in this connexion referred to the decision in 44 M L J 217,[1] as the Court there refused leave to appeal to His Majesty. That was a case in which the petitioner was wishing to challenge a decision in respect of arrears of rent. There was a large number of respondents, but in each case the amount owed or alleged to be owed was very small. The decision does not apply to the present case because the amount involved, as I have indicated, is really substantial. The application for a certificate will therefore be granted.

The right to sue in such a case would have to be in abeyance until a new trustee was appointed, in which case the period of six years' limitation would not commence until a new trustee had been appointed. If there are other trustees who are themselves not liable, the period of limitation will start running immediately the loss is occasioned, because they will have in themselves the right to sue their co-trustees for the loss occasioned by him. Order of Reference

Varadachariar J. — The only point arising for determination at this stage is the question of limitation on which the lower Court held against the plaintiffs and dismissed the suit in limine. The plaintiffs and defendant 3 were the trustees of a temple on the date of the institution of the suit. Defendant 1 was the managing trustee of the temple from 1921 up to September 1927; defendant 2 is said to have been the trustee from 26th July 1914 to 8th February 1928; defendant 3 was appointed trustee on 22nd May 1927 while the plaintiffs were appointed trustees only in June and July 1928. The suit was instituted on 15th September 1930 claiming that the defendants should be directed to pay certain amounts to the plaint temple in the following circumstances: Two schedules, Schs. A and B, were attached to the plaint. Sch. A mentions items of amounts due to the temple up to fasli 1332 which remained uncollected up to the date of the suit. Sch. B mentions amounts said to have accrued due to the devasthanam subsequent to the commencement of fasli 1332, and remaining uncollected up to the date of the suit. The plaint refers to the difficulties experienced by the plaintiffs in getting possession of the account books relating to the trust after they were appointed to the office and proceeds to say in para. 7 that on a scrutiny of the accounts and documents handed over by defendant 1 it was found that the various amounts specified in Schs. A and B had not been collected and that as many of them had become barred the temple had been put to loss thereby. There was a further allegation that in respect of items which had become barred even before the defendants took office, the defendants would be liable to the temple by reason of their failure to take steps against their predecessors in office to recover damages under that head.

It is to this claim that the defendants pleaded the bar of limitation under Art. 36, Lim. Act. The learned Subordinate Judge held that the plea was well founded and was supported by the decision in 33 Mad 308[1] and accordingly dismissed the suit. Hence this appeal. It cannot be denied that the decision in 33 Mad 308[1] does support the defendants' contention. But there is very little discussion of the question in that judgment and no reference has been made in that judgment to 20 Mad 398[2] which clearly proceeded on the footing that an action like the present would be governed by the six years' rule, apparently under Art. 120 though the Article is not specifically referred to. We might add that there are several reasons which in our opinion make it unreasonable to hold that Art. 36 applies to a case like the present. The words "malfeasance, misfeasance and non-feasance" may not perhaps be said to be inappropriate words to be applied to a trustee; but, it hardly seems to us right to speak of a claim like the present on behalf of the trust as a claim for compensation. We may in this connexion refer to Column 1 of Art. 98 which uses the very language found in illustration (a) to S. 23, Trusts Act, namely that the trustee is in such cases liable to make good to the trust estate the amount lost by reason of his breach of trust. Referring to Column 3 of Art. 36 we may also point out that it will be scarcely reasonable to expect the very trustee who has been guilty of breach of trust to take steps against himself to recover damages for the benefit of the trust, whereas if Column 3 of Art. 36 is to be applied, the suit would become barred on the expiry of two years from the date of misfeasance, malfeasance, or nonfeasance irrespective of the fact that the same trustee may continue in office.

Again, comparing Column 3 of Art. 36 with Column 3 of Art. 98, it will be noticed that where a claim like the present is made against the estate of a deceased trustee, limitation starts from the date of the trustee's death and if loss has not resulted on that date, from the date of the loss. It could scarcely have been intended that when a breach of trust has been committed by a trustee by negligence to collect trust funds, limitation could start immediately on the date of the breach of trust if the action to recover the amount of the loss should be brought during his lifetime, but there should be a fresh starting point from the date of his death or from the date of the loss, when the loss is sought to be made good out of his general estate. These considerations lead us to think that it could not be the intention of the Legislature that the general language of Art. 36 should be applied to a well-known category of cases in the law of trusts. It is true that there is no Article (corresponding to Art. 98), which specifically deals with actions for breach of trust brought during the lifetime of the trustee or ex-trustee. But the absence of such an Article will only lead to the application of Art. 120, to such action and will not justify the Court putting an unreasonable interpretation on Art. 36. In A I R 1936 Bom 30,[3] the learned Judges were of opinion that a suit similar to the present would be governed by Art. 120. It has not been seriously contended before us that the present case is governed by S. 10, Lim. Act : vide 41 Mad 319.[4] The only question therefore is whether the case is governed by Art. 36 or by Art. 120.

1. Subramania Aiyar v. Gopala Aiyar, (1910) 33 Mad 308=7 I C 898=20 M L J 633.
2. Ranga Pai v. Baba, (1897) 20 Mad 398.
3. Shirinbai Dinshaw v. Navroji Pestonji, (1936) 23 A I R Bom 30=160 I C 612=37 Bom L R 946.
4. Tholasingam Chetti v. Vedachella Aiyar (1918) 5 A I R Mad 624=42 I C 544=41 Mad 319.

If Art. 120 is to be held applicable, the further question will arise, what is the starting point. The general expression 'right to sue accrues' has been held in several cases to be an expression that must be construed in the light of the substantive law. There can be no doubt that in several English cases and in A I R 1936 Bom 30,[3] limitation has been held to commence to run from the date of the breach of trust. Whatever may be the appropriateness of this view in the case of private trusts where the beneficiary may be expected to enforce his own rights, there are obvious difficulties in applying this view to public trusts where, as long as the trustee remains in office, there may be no other person entitled to sue the trustee to make good the loss occasioned by the breach of trust unless some member of the public takes steps to institute a suit under S. 92, Civil P. C., and have a receiver appointed in whom the right of action may be vested. Here again Col. 3 of Art. 98 would rather suggest that the date of the cessation of the trusteeship whether by death or otherwise may be a reasonable starting point, but there is no authority which specifically supports that view. Even if the starting point under Art. 120 is held to be the dates of the various breaches complained of, the decree of the lower Court dismissing the entire suit cannot be sustained, because according to the plaint allegations, some of the breaches of trust might have happened within six years of the institution of the suit.

It is therefore necessary for the purpose of the case to decide whether Art. 36 or Art. 120 is the proper Article applicable to a suit filed against a trustee or ex-trustee to recover the loss sustained by the trust by reason of his omission to collect moneys due to the trust. In view of the conflict between 20 Mad 398[2] and 33 Mad 308,[1] we would refer the question to a Full Bench; we would also invite the opinion of the Full Bench on the question whether if Art. 120 is applicable, what is the starting point.

Opinion of the Full Bench.

Leach C. J. — This reference embraces two questions which may be stated as follows : (1) Does Art. 36 or Art. 120 of Sch. 1, Lim. Act, 1908, apply to a suit filed against a trustee or ex-trustee to make good loss sustained by the trust by reason of his omission to collect moneys due to the trust ? (2) If Art. 120 is applicable, when does limitation commence to run ?

Article 36 relates to suits for compensation for malfeasance, misfeasance or nonfeasance independent of contract, and not specially provided for in the schedule of the Act. It fixes a period of two years from the date when the malfeasance, misfeasance or nonfeasance takes place. Art. 120 is the residuary Article. It fixes a limitation period of six years in respect of suits for which no period of limitation is provided elsewhere in the Schedule and time begins to run when the right to sue accrues. It has been necessary to refer the questions set out above to a Full Bench because there are conflicting decisions of this Court with regard to the first question, and the second question follows if Art. 120 applies, because in some cases for more than six years there may be no one in a position to sue. In 20 Mad 398[2] Shephard and Davies JJ. applied Art. 120. In 33 Mad 308,[1] Sir Ralph S. Benson, Offg. C. J. and Krishnaswami Aiyar J. considered that Art. 36 governed a suit of the nature of the one under discussion. In 20 Mad 398[2] the plaintiffs and the defendants, together with one Subbaraya Pai, were the trustees of a temple. Subbaraya Pai died in 1884, but for some years before his death he was left in exclusive management of the temple affairs. He was succeeded in the management by the defendants, who remained in management of the temple until 1891, when their co-trustees filed the suit to exclude them from trust and to compel them to make good sums lost as the result of breaches of trust alleged to have been committed by them. The question whether S. 10, Lim. Act, applied was discussed and the Court was of the opinion that it did not. It was however held that the defendants were liable for the loss occasioned by them within six years from the date when the suit was instituted. Art. 120, Lim. Act, was not specifically referred to, but as the Court decided that the period of limitation was six years it follows that it considered that this Article applied. In 33 Mad 308[1] the suit was instituted by the plaintiff as the trustee of a temple for recovery of a sum of money representing the loss to the temple occasioned by breaches of trust committed by the father of the defendant, he having been the preceding trustee. The suit was dismissed on the ground that it was barred by the law of limitation. On appeal it was argued that Art. 98 was applicable, but the argument was rejected as the Court was of the opinion that the suit against the father was time-barred under Art. 36 and therefore no suit would lie against his son.

Another case bearing on the first question embodied in the reference and quoted to us is that of A I R 1936 Bom 30,[3] where a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court held that a suit against trustees for alleged breaches of trust was governed by Art. 120 and time began to run from the date of the breach. In none of these cases however was there any real discussion of the questions now under consideration. In 20 Mad 398[2] and in A I R 1936 Bom 30[3] the learned Judges took it for granted that Art. 120 did apply and in 33 Mad 308[1] the discussion was limited to the application of Arts. 36 and 98. I may here mention that my learned brother Varadachariar, sitting alone, held in 40 M L W 275[5] that a suit by a trustee of a temple against a previous trustee to recover moneys misappropriated by him was governed by Art. 120 and not by Art. 61 or Art. 62 Limitation Act, and that no cause of action accrued to anybody as long as the defaulting trustee continued to be in office. This decision really embodies the answers to the questions under reference.

Article 36 applies to torts not specially provided for, and if it stood alone there would be little to indicate that it was not intended to apply to breaches of trust of the nature of those we have now in mind. But there is Art. 98, and when the two Articles are considered together there are strong indications that the Legislature did not intend Art. 36 to apply to trustees. In the first place, in Art. 36, the word "compensation" is used, which is the appropriate word to apply in connexion with a suit to remedy an injury to a person or a person's property. Art. 98 speaks of suits "to make good" the loss, which are more appropriate than the word "compensation" when the loss is not a personal one. Then it must be remembered that when the prescribed period of limitation has commenced it continues until the sands have run out. Something may happen to start a fresh period of limitation, but that is another matter. If Art. 36 were to apply to an act of non-feasance on the part of the trustee, it would mean that if the trustee lived he would be free from all liability in two years, but if he died before the two years had elapsed his estate would continue to be liable for another three years. This could never have been the intention of the Legislature and leads in itself to the conclusion that Art. 36 does not include wrongs committed by trustees in respect of trusts. As Art. 36 does not apply, the only Article which can apply to a suit like the one out of which this reference arises is Art. 120 and we answer the first question accordingly.

With regard to the second question, it will be observed that Art. 120 declares that limitation shall start to run when the right to sue accrues. There can be no cause of action until there is a party capable of suing and until there is a cause of action there can be no question of the law of limitation coming into operation. See (1821) 5 B & Ald 204=24 R R 325=106 E R 1167,[6] 20 C W N 833,[7] 50 Cal 49[8] and 11 Lah 657.[9] It follows that if a sole trustee of a public trust commits a breach of trust the loss cannot be made good, without voluntary action on the trustee's part, until there is a new trustee. The right to sue in such a case would have to lie in abeyance until a new trustee was appointed, in which case the period of six years' limitation would not commence until a new trustee had been appointed. If there are other trustees who are themselves not liable, the period of limitation will start running immediately the loss is occasioned, because they will have in themselves the right to sue their co-trustee for the loss occasioned by him. Of course, if the co-trustees have also made themselves liable for the breach of trust the position would be the same as in the case of a defaulting sole trustee. In the case of a private trust, the cestui que trust would ordinarily have the right to sue from the date of the breach of trust. It will therefore, depend on the circumstances when time will commence to run and we answer the second question in this sense.

(After the expression of the opinion of the Full Bench the Court delivered the following judgment.)

Varadachariar J.—Now that the Full Bench has held that Art. 36, Limitation Act, does not govern the present case, the decision of the lower Court dismissing the suit on the ground that it was governed by Art. 36 cannot stand. It is not possible at this stage to deal finally with the existence and extent of the possible bar under Art. 120. It will be much more convenient to leave it to the lower Court to deal with that question in the light of the observations contained in the judgment of the Full Bench after taking such evidence as may be relevant to that question. In view however of the fact that it is about seven years now after the suit was instituted, the lower Court would do well to try the whole case instead of confining itself again to the question of limitation. The decree of the lower Court is set aside and the case remanded for disposal on the merits. Costs to abide the result. The court-fee paid on the memorandum of appeal will be refunded.

Letters Patent Appeal No. 292 of 1927, Decided on 15th December 1937, against judgment of Venkatasubbarao J. in A. S. No. 110 of 1923.

(a) Appeal—New plea—Point not raised in pleadings by parties but raised by Court itself — Parties to appeal should be given opportunity of meeting it.

While it is open to the Court to decide a case on any rule of law which it considers applies, it is not entitled to decide a case on a point taken by itself without giving the parties to the appeal an opportunity of meeting it. [P 359 C 1]

(b) Part Performance — Widow obtaining decree for maintenance against her step-sons — Maintenance made charge on family property — One step-son selling his share to other persons — Agreement between widow and alienees providing that in case alienees pay balance of maintenance, widow would execute formal release of her charge on property—Balance not paid—Assignee of widow's decree selling property in execution and bringing suit for possession of share — Doctrine of part performance held did not apply.

A widow obtained a decree for maintenance against her step sons and the amount of maintenance was made a charge on the family property. One of the step sons sold his share in the property to certain persons. The widow entered into an agreement with the alienees under which they were to pay her a certain sum in satisfaction of her claim for future maintenance against the properties in their hands. Of this sum a certain portion had already been paid. The agreement provided that when the balance would be received, the widow was to execute a formal release of the charge created by the decree. The balance was never paid and the assignee of widow's decree sold the property in execution, purchased it himself and sued for possession of the share:

Held that the doctrine of part performance did not apply to the case. [P 359 C 2]

Leach C. J. — In O. S. No. 1 of 1889 of the District Court of Trichinopoly a Hindu widow, one Venkalakshmi Ammal, sued her step-sons, Venkatarama Iyer and Ramarathnam Iyer for maintenance, and on 2nd September 1890 obtained a decree which applied to the maintenance then due and to future maintenance. The maintenance was made a charge on the family properties. The decree was not expressed in precise terms, but it was held in subsequent execution proceedings that the decree did in fact give a charge on the family properties and this question must be regarded as having been finally decided. On 13th November 1888 Ramarathnam sold his share in 393 acres of the family lands to one Krishna Iyer, who was defendant 21 in the widow's suit. On 27th November 1888 Krishna Iyer sold his interest in these properties to Vengama Naidu and Perumal Naidu. Between 7th December 1888 and 2nd June 1890 Vengama Naidu and Perumal Naidu under 13 deeds disposed of their interest in the properties to various people. On 27th September 1908 the widow assigned her decree to the plaintiffs in the suit out of which this appeal arises. As assignees of the decree, the plaintiffs instituted proceedings in execution and obtained an order for the sale of Ramarathnam's interest. At the Court auction they purchased Ramarathnam's interest. On 14th September 1915 the plaintiffs filed a suit in the Court of the District Munsif of Kulitalai for partition of the properties and for possession of their half share. The District Munsif's Court had no jurisdiction to try the suit because of its value and the plaint had to be returned for filing in the Court of the Subordinate Judge. This was done and the suit was numbered as O. S. No. 45 of 1917. There were 101 defendants, of whom 98 were sued as alienees under transfers executed after 7th December 1888.

In 1894 the widow entered into an agreement with Vengama Naidu and Perumal Naidu under which they were to pay her a sum of Rs. 1400 in satisfaction of her claim for future maintenance against the properties in their hands. Of the Rs. 1400, a sum of Rs. 1000 had already been paid. The agreement provided that when the balance of Rs. 400 had been received and the widow had realized the amount representing the arrears of maintenance at the date of the agreement, she was to execute a formal release of the charge created by the decree on Ramarathnam's half share in the family properties. The arrears were not realized and consequently the agreement was renewed in 1903 and again in 1906. The original agreement has not been put in evidence; but the agreements of 1903 and 1906 have been and are marked as Exs. 18 and 18a respectively. The agreement of 1903 reads as follows:

> If according to what you have executed and given you pay with interest the sum of Rs. 400 which is the balance due after deducting the amount of Rs. 1000 received from you, I shall, as soon as the whole of the decree amount due upto this day is realized, cause the plaintiff in the said suit to execute and deliver a memorandum of release in your favour to the effect that the liability for the decree of the lands purchased by you from Krishna Iyer has been given up. I shall not attach the said lands and proceed in execution for the amounts due under the said decree.

This document was signed by one P. Ramaswamy Iyer as the agent of the widow. That he had the authority to sign is not in question. The agreement of 1906 is in similar terms, but instead of the words "as soon as the whole of the decree amount due up to this day is realized" we have the words "after the realization of the entire balance of the decree." There can be no doubt that the effect of each of these documents was this: If Vengama Naidu and Perumal Naidu paid the balance of Rs. 400 with interest and the widow was able to realize from other properties the amount due to her as arrears of maintenance at the date of the document she would execute the contemplated release; in the meantime, she would not take steps in execution of the decree against the properties in the possession of Vengama Naidu and Perumal. These agreements were not recorded under the provisions of O. 21, Rule 2, Civil P. C. and therefore cannot be regarded as adjustments of the decree. On 17th September 1908, that is two days before the assignment by the widow of her decree in favour of the present plaintiffs, Vengama Naidu instituted O. S. No. 406 of 1908 in the Court of the District Munsif of kulitalai for a decree for specific performance of the agreement of 1906, the last renewal of the agreement of 1894. On 14th August 1911 the District Munsif dismissed the suit. An appeal followed to the Subordinate Judge of Trichinopoly, who held that the suit was premature and accordingly dismissed the Appeal. A second appeal was then filed in this Court. The widow died during the pendency of the appeal and the present plaintiffs were added as parties. This Court held that the plaintiffs, as assignees of the maintenance decree, were not the legal representatives of the widow and being assignees an action for specific performance did not lie. This judgment was delivered on 12th March 1915.

Returning now to the suit out of which this appeal arises, the Subordinate Judge accepted the contention that the doctrine of lis pendens applied to the alienations and therefore regarded them as being subject to the charge in favour of the widow. But he dismissed the suit on the broad ground that there were enough equities with the alienee defendants to override all consequences arising from the operation of the doctrine of lis pendens. This judgment was delivered on 21st August 1922. An appeal was filed against this decision in this Court and it came before Krishnan and Venkatasubba Rao JJ., on 6th and 14th September, and on 1st and 8th October 1926. After the arguments had closed, judgment was reserved and was delivered on 5th November 1926. Venkatasubba Rao J., agreed that the doctrine of lis pendens did apply and accepted the contention that the agreement of 1894 and its subsequent renewals did not operate to bar the execution of the widow's decree. The learned Judge however laid great stress on the fact that the plaintiffs had taken the assignment of the decree with full knowledge of the agreement, and considered that 'in these circumstances it was a fraud on the alienees to enforce the maintenance decree. He also held that the doctrine of part performance applied and on this basis refused the plaintiffs the reliefs they sought, but instead granted them a money decree for Rs. 400 with interest from 1894. Krishnan J. considered that the suit could be maintained as framed and relied on the decision of this Court in 42 Mad 338.[1] In that case a Full Bench consisting of Abdur Rahim, Oldfield and Seshagiri Ayyar JJ. held that a decree which had been satisfied was still capable of execution so long as the satisfaction was not reported to and certified by the Court. The only remedy for a judgment-debtor who is called upon to pay in execution proceedings, having already paid out of Court, is an action for damages, against the decree-holder, but when the decree has been executed by an assignee no action for damages will lie against the assignee, notwithstanding that he has taken the assignment with notice of the fact that the decree has been satisfied. Krishnan J. also accepted the application of the doctrine of lis pendens.

It falls to be observed that the doctrine of part performance on which Venkatasubba Rao J. relied was not raised in the pleadings, was not made the subject of an issue and was not raised in the course of the arguments. Krishnan J. added a note to his judgment, after he had perused that of Venkatasubba Rao J. and that pointed out that this was an entirely new question which was not raised by the parties and not argued at the bar. While it is open to the Court to decide a case on any rule of law which it considers applies it is not entitled to decide a case on a point taken by itself without giving the parties to the appeal an opportunity of meeting it. O. 41, Rule 2 Civil P. C. says that the appellant shall not, except by leave of the Court, urge or be heard in support of any ground of objection not set forth in the memorandum of appeal, but the Appellate Court in deciding the appeal, shall not be confined to the ground of objection set forth in the memorandum of appeal or taken by leave of the Court under the Rule. There is however this important proviso. The Court shall not rest its decision on any other ground unless the party who may be affected thereby has had a sufficient opportunity of contesting the case on that ground. With great respect, I consider that before Venkatasubba Rao J. based his decision on the doctrine of part performance he should have given the plaintiff's advocate an opportunity of stating his views on the question. As the doctrine of part performance was relied on by Venkatasubba Rao J. and has been made the subject of argument before us I will express my views on the question. The widow had obtained a decree for maintenance and the amount she was entitled to receive by way of maintenance was made a charge on the family properties. If her step sons did not pay what was due as maintenance she was entitled to proceed against those properties, notwithstanding that they had passed or that some of them had passed into other hands. It was open to her to agree with the alienees to release the properties in their hands from the charge, but until there was a release by her, valid in law, the properties remained charged. In this case all that had happened was that an agreement was entered into by the widow with the original alienees under which she undertook to release the properties with which they were concerned on certain events happening. Until they happened — and they never did happen—the properties remained charged. The fact that the widow received Rs. 1000 out of the Rs. 1400 did not entitle Vengama Naidu and Perumal Naidu to a release. Therefore I fail to see how the doctrine of part performance can have any application whatsoever. Venkatasubba Rao J. also considered that the present action constituted a fraud on the alienees. There was here clearly no fraud. The plaintiffs took with notice of the agreement of 1894, but that did not disentitle them to execute the decree. They were at full liberty to do so.

I have already mentioned that it was accepted by the trial Court and by Krishnan and Venkatasubba Rao JJ. on appeal that the doctrine of lis pendens applied. It was suggested at one stage in the arguments before us that this view was wrong but when it was pointed out to the learned advocate for the respondent that the question had been raised in the execution proceedings to which the present parties or their representatives were parties and there decided, he very properly did not press the point. It is clear that it was raised on the execution proceedings and there finally decided, and consequently the argument is not open to the defendants in this Court. The same remarks apply to a suggestion which has been made that the agreement of 1894 and its subsequent renewals operated to prevent the widow proceeding in execution against the properties in the possession of the alienees. This question was also raised in the execution proceedings and there also decided. Therefore the position is this: The plaintiffs are the assignees in law of the widow's decree and they were entitled to execute it against the family properties, notwithstanding that they had passed into the hands of the defendants. They did execute the decree and in the execution proceedings they bought in the half share of Ramarathnam. Consequently they now possess Ramarathnam's half interest in the family estate It has been suggested that S. 91 of the Trusts Act applies, but it is clear that it does not. The decision in the suit for specific performance entirely disposes of this argument.

The appeal will be allowed and the case remanded to the trial Court for disposal on the merits. The appellant will be entitled to costs here and before the Division Bench. He will also be entitled to a refund of the court-fee paid on the appeal as on the Letters Patent appeal. A regrettable feature of this case is the tremendous delay which has taken place. The suit was filed as long ago as 1915 and an appeal lay direct to this Court. As I have pointed out, the learned trial Judge delivered judgment on 21st August 1922. An appeal was filed in that year to this Court and it came before Krishnan and Venkatasubba Rao JJ. in September and October 1926. The learned Judges disagreed, and in accordance with the practice of this Court which then ruled it was necessary that the appeal should be heard by a Full Bench. It has taken 11 years for this to happen. The appeal has been in this Court from 1922 until now a total period of 15 years. But for the fact that these dates appear on the record I should not have believed it possible that there could be such delay. The fact that the number of parties is large and that some of them died and their legal representatives have had to be brought on the record can be no justification for this great delay. The delay is so great that it would appear to amount to a scandal, and I have directed that a full inquiry be made into the matter.

* (a) Crown Debts — Priority — Money decree against debtor — Property sold in execution — Arrears of income tax due by debtor — Court can order payment of this Crown debt to Government on mere application by Income-tax officer without formal suit—S. 46, Income-tax Act, does not bar such application.

The Crown has the right of priority in payment of debts due to it over all unsecured creditors. [P 363 C 1]

Where in execution of a money decree against a debtor his property is sold and arrears of income-tax are due by the debtor, the Crown has priority in respect of this debt and the Court has inherent power under S. 151, Civil P. C., to order the payment of this Crown debt to the Government, on the mere application of the Income-tax Officer without having to file a suit. S. 46 of Income-tax Act does not profess to be exhaustive and it cannot, without express words to that effect, take away from the Crown the right of enforcing payment by mere application. Similarly no special Act of the Legislature is required to enable the Crown to apply to the Court for payment out of money to which it has an undoubted right: A I R 1936 Mad 132, A I R 1934 Rang 8 and 33 Cal 1040, Rel. on. [P 363 C 1, 2]

An attachment does not confer title. Hence simply because the decree-holder in execution of his decree has attached judgment-debtor's property, that does not make him a secured creditor: 26 Mad 673 (F B), Foll. [P 363 C 2]

Varadachariar J. — Mr. Balasubramania Aiyar raised two questions before me, in support of this revision petition. On one of them I feel little doubt, but the other point is one of some importance and notwithstanding the reliance placed on behalf of the Government on the decisions in 59 Mad 428[1] and 11 Rang 467,[2] I think that it should be considered by a Division Bench or even by a Full Bench if the Chief Justice so directs. This revision petition arises out of an application made by the Income-tax Officer of Madura South to the District Munsif of Madura Town, purporting to be under S. 151, Civil P. C. and praying that out of some monies in the custody of that Court in the course of the execution of a decree obtained by the present petitioner against the assessee, the arrears of income-tax due by the assessee might be paid in the first instance. Two questions were raised before the lower Court on behalf of the present petitioner, viz. (i) whether the Government's claim was entitled to priority and (ii) whether as a matter of procedure, the petition by the Income-tax Officer to the Civil Court was sustainable. On both those points, the lower Court held against the present petitioner and directed payment to the Government in the first instance. Hence this revision petition by the decree-holder. So far as the priority of the Government's claim is concerned, I see no reason to differ from the view taken by the lower Court. Mr. Balasubramania Aiyar relied on an expression of doubt in 7 Mad 434,[3] as to the applicability in this country of the English doctrine relating to the priority of Crown debts; but I think the weight of authority in favour of the recognition of that priority even in this country is so strong that this expression of doubt cannot help the petitioner to any material degree. (cf. 59 Mad 428[1] and 59 Mad 872,[4] 33 Cal 1040,[5] 11 Rang 467[2] and the provisions in the Insolvency Acts relating to the priority of Crown debts.) It is on the question of procedure that I have felt some difficulty. Some of the cases above referred to arose out of applications on behalf of the Government to recover court-fees payable to Government in pauper suits. There is no difficulty in supporting the maintainability of the petition by Government in that class of cases, because the Civil Procedure Code treats the Government as a decree-holder to the extent of the court-fee payable and the ordinary procedure under the Code is available for the enforcement of that claim. In 11 Rang 467[2] the petition related to the recovery of income-tax, and in that sense the case is directly in point; but though the learned Judge gave a ruling in favour of the maintainability of the petition, he also states that the application was not opposed on behalf of the respondents and that they consented to the payment. I am therefore unable to treat that decision as concluding the point. In 59 Mad 428[1] Cornish J. was dealing with a claim for arrears of motor tax; and relying upon (1878) 9 Ch D 469,[6] and on the decision in 33 Cal 1040,[5] the learned Judge held that an application like the present must be treated as maintainable. The 33 Calcutta case is not strictly analogous because it related to a claim for court-fee payable to Government in respect of which, as already observed, Government is in the position of a decree-holder.

The proposition that the declaration of a first charge on the subject-matter of the suit does not preclude the Government from enforcing its claim as a decree-holder in other ways does not throw much light upon the question now raised before me. (1878) 9 Ch D 469[6] no doubt recognized the right of the Crown to proceed otherwise than in the manner pointed out by the Income-tax Act; but as in that case, the application was made in the course of liquidation proceedings, an application would be the proper form. The Indian Income-tax Act of 1922 makes detailed provision in S. 46 for the recovery of income-tax. Certain powers are given to the Collector and certain powers are given to the Income-tax Officer. I make no further reference to the provision relating to the Collector's powers because no application has been made in the present case by the Collector and the Act does not expect him to make an application but to exercise certain powers of his own. The Income-tax Officer is authorized under certain conditions to adopt the procedure available for the collection of arrears of Municipal tax or local rate. Provision is also made in sub-cl. (5) for a requisition to persons paying salaries to assessees. It is a matter requiring consideration whether in view of these detailed provisions having been made by the statute itself for the recovery of assessment, it is permissible to recognize in addition an application to the ordinary Civil Court which must prima facie be regarded as dealing only with the rights of litigants in the ordinary Civil Court. It may be that arrears of income-tax can be made the subject-matter of a regular suit as a Crown debt; but whether an application under S. 151, Civil P. C. or under any general principle of law was at all contemplated by the Income-tax Act or by the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code is a matter about which I entertain grave doubts, notwithstanding the respectful attention that I have givent o the cases to which I have already referred. It is this point that I should like to be heard and decided authoritatively by a Bench subject to the order of the Chief Justice. The decision in C. M. P. No. 2083 of 1933 affords me no guidance because there was in that case a distraint order issued by the Tahsildar under the provisions of the Revenue Recovery Act.

Opinion of Full Bench.

Leach C. J. — The petitioner obtained a money decree against one Govinda Rao and in execution thereof attached certain moveable properties belonging to the judgment-debtor and brought them to sale. Govinda Rao under an order of assessment dated 28th August 1934 was required to pay a sum of Rs. 301.13.0 by way of income-tax. He did not comply with the notice of demand for payment and on 12th November 1934 a penalty of Rs. 10 was imposed by the Income-tax Officer because of the default, thus increasing the total amount due by the assessee to Rs. 311.13.0. Before the sale, the Income-tax Officer filed an application in Court asking for an order directing the payment out to him from the sale proceeds when the sale took place of the amount due to Government by Govinda Rao. The sale in execution was in due course carried out, but only realized Rs. 227.9.0. After reserving the amount required for the costs of execution, the District Munsif ordered the balance to be paid out to the Income-tax Officer. The question which we are called upon to decide is whether the Court had power to order the payment out of moneys due to Government on mere application.

I had occasion to consider this question in 11 Rang 467,[2] when sitting as a Judge of the Rangoon High Court, and, following the decision of Sale, J. in 33 Cal 1040,[5] held that inasmuch as the Crown has priority over unsecured creditors in the payment of debts the Court can, on application and without a formal attachment being issued, order the payment of a Crown debt due by the debtor where there are funds in Court belonging to the debtor. The District Munsif referred to this decision in his order. The order which I passed in that case was passed by consent, and the only arguments were those addressed to the Court on behalf of the Crown, but the question has been fully argued before us today and I see no reason for changing the opinion there expressed.

It has been suggested that inasmuch as S. 46, Income-tax Act, provides modes for the recovery of arrears of income-tax the Crown is not entitled to adopt any different method. Sub-s. (2) states that the Income-tax Officer may forward to the Collector a certificate under his signature specifying the amount of arrears due from an assessee, and the Collector, on receipt of such certificate, shall proceed to recover from the assessee the amount specified as if it were an arrear of land revenue. Without prejudice to any powers of the Collector in this behalf, he shall, for the purpose of recovering the amount, have, in respect of the attachment and sale of debts due to the assessee, the powers which under the Civil Procedure Code a Civil Court has in respect of attachment and sale of debts due to a judgment-debtor for the purpose of the recovery of an amount due under a decree. By sub-s. (3) it is provided that in any area in respect of which the Commissioner has directed that any arrears may be recovered by any process enforceable for the recovery of an arrear of any Municipal tax or local rate imposed under any enactment for the time being in force in any part of the province, the Income-tax Officer may proceed to recover the amount due by such process. Under sub-s. (5) if any assessee is in receipt of income chargeable under the head "salaries" the Income-tax Officer may require the employer to deduct from his salary what is due by way of income-tax. This section however does not profess to be exhaustive and it cannot without express words to that effect take away from the Crown the right of enforcing payment by any other method open to it. Therefore I do not regard S. 46 as imposing a bar to an application of the nature of the one we are now concerned with.

The learned advocate for the petitioner then contends that as a private person cannot enforce payment without first obtaining a decree, the Crown is in the same position. The argument is that a private person is governed by the provisions of the Civil P. C. and as there is nothing in the Code which places the Crown in a different position the procedure there contemplated must be followed. I am unable to agree. This argument ignores the special position of the Crown, the special circumstances and the Court's inherent powers. It cannot be denied that the Crown had the right of priority in payment of debts due to it. It is a right which has always existed and has been repeatedly recognized in India. If the Crown is entitled as it is, to prior payment over all unsecured creditors, the position of secured creditors does not arise. I see no reason why the Crown should not be allowed to apply to the Court for an order directing its debt to be paid out of moneys in Court belonging to the debtor, without having to file a suit. Of course it must be a debt which is not disputed or is indisputable. In this case the debt represents money due to the Crown under the Income-tax Act and the demand of the Income-tax Officer is not open to question.

What would be the effect if the Crown were not able to apply to the Court for the withdrawal of the money in a case like this? According to the argument it would mean that the Crown would have to file a suit against the debtor and the opposing creditor and then obtain an interim injunction preventing the money from being withdrawn from Court pending the decision of the suit. When the suit came on for hearing the Court would be bound to decree it. Therefore there would be not only a great waste of the time of the parties and of the Court, but the opposing creditor would run the danger of being mulcted in costs. The Court must pay money in its hands out to the person entitled to it. If the Court were asked to pay out money to A with the certain knowledge that the money belonged to B it would naturally decline to do so and would make sure that B got it. Here, the Crown is entitled to the money in Court, there is no question about this, and asks the Court to pay it out. The right to payment being indisputable, justice requires that it should be paid out to the Crown and formal application for payment has been made. It seems to me that both right and convenience demand that the Court should exercise its inherent power. At one stage the learned advocate for the petitioner suggested that the attachment having taken place the petitioner was in the position of a secured creditor. This argument is not open to him in view of the decision of a Full Bench of this Court in 26 Mad 673[7]. He did suggest that this decision had been overruled by the Judicial Committee in 56 Mad 405[8], but it is clear from a perusal of the report that their Lordships there refused to go into the question and reserved their decision for a future occasion. Consequently we have got to accept the decision in 26 Mad 673[7] as stating the law correctly; and the petitioner is not in the position of a secured creditor.

The learned advocate for the petitioner has also argued that unless there is some statute which expressly authorizes a petition of this nature the petition cannot be maintained. I have in effect already dealt with this question and it follows from what I have said that I do not consider that a special Act of the Legislature is required to enable the Crown to apply to the Court for payment out of money to which it has an undoubted right.

In 59 Mad 428,[1] Cornish, J. took the same view. There money was due to the Crown as arrears of tax under the Madras Motor Vehicles Taxation Act. The learned Judge also relied on the judgment of Sale J., in 33 Cal 1040.[5] For these reasons I am of the opinion that the District Munsif came to the correct conclusion and his order should not be disturbed. The petition will be dismissed with costs.

Varadachariar J. — My doubts have been indicated in the order of reference. I am not able to say that they have been wholly dispelled. They are however not serious enough to warrant my dissenting from the conclusion which my Lord and my learned brother have reached on what is after all a question of procedure; even when making the reference, I felt no doubt as to the right of the Crown to priority. I may add that the balance of convenience certainly seems to be in favour of the view indicated in the judgment just delivered. I therefore agree with the order dismissing the petition with costs.

Mockett J.—I agree with my Lord the Chief Justice. It must be remembered that the Court holds the money for the purpose of paying it to the person entitled to it and in this presidency so long as the decision in 26 Mad 673[7] is law, as it undoubtedly still is, there is no difficulty with regard to third parties claiming prior rights by way of attachment. The position being so, this case does not seem to present any difficulty. As a matter of expediency, it is obvious that the course adopted here is the better. The alternative seems to be this, as has been pointed out by my Lord the Chief Justice, a suit is filed with regard to a matter which the defendant cannot contest and the only result is that there is delay and unnecessary expenditure for the parties. What happens under the present procedure? Here is this money lying in Court for the purpose of being paid out to the person who is entitled to receive it. The Crown goes to the Court and says: "Here is a debt which is due to me about which there can be no dispute." I consider that under those circumstances the Court can rightly invoke its power under S. 151, Civil P. C., in making the payment to the person entitled to it. Cornish J. in the case to which my Lord has referred, 59 Mad 428,[1] draws attention to a decision from which I have derived assistance (1878) 9 Ch D 469.[6] In that case a Bench consisting of James, Brett and Cotton L. JJ. emphasized the fact that a remedy given by a statute for the recovery of a debt due to the Crown in no way takes away the right of the Crown to invoke other methods if it thinks fit. I agree that the decision of the Court below is right and that this petition should be dismissed with costs.

The word "sister" is a plain English word and according to the rule of law governing the construction of statutes it must receive its plain ordinary and grammatical meaning. So interpreted, a sister is a "woman born of same parents as oneself." A half-sister not being mentioned in the Act will retain the place hitherto assigned to her as an heir in presidencies where her right of heirship is recognized, and therefore "sister" does not include a half-sister in Act 2 of 1929: A I R 1933 All 491 and A I R 1935 Oudh 332, Rel. on. [P 366 C 2; P 367 C 1, 2]

(c) Hindu Law—Family arrangement between widow and reversioners—Essentials of—Widow succeeding to her son's estate after his death—Suit by next presumptive reversioner N against widow on footing that widow inherited property as heir to her son and that N was next presumptive reversioner—Widow denying that she took property as heir to her son and setting up independent title as devisee under her husband's will whereby she was to enjoy property for life and after her death her step-daughters were to take it absolutely Suit compromised—Half of the property going to N and half to be retained by widow for her life and thereafter to daughters — Compromise held bona-fide family settlement.

It is competent to a Hindu female holding a limited interest in the estate she holds as the heir of the last male owner to enter into a family settlement with the reversioners to the estate. The Courts in India and the Privy Council have applied the principles of English law relating to family settlements to such settlements. In doing so, Courts have always regard to the nature of the interest possessed by such a limited owner and the reversioners to the estate and the limitations on their power recognized by the law to which they are subject. A Hindu widow is the owner of the estate which she inherits for the time being and fully represents it whether in litigation or otherwise. The interest of reversioners is only a spes successionis and it cannot be made the subject-matter of any bargain. The arrangement entered into by the widow with the reversioners must not be a device to divide the estate between her and the reversioners to defraud the actual reversioners when the succession opens. Subject to these limitations, a family settlement bona fide entered into by a Hindu widow will be valid and binding on the reversion. The question of bona fides is to be considered with reference to the date when the transaction was entered into. [P 367 C 2]

A Hindu after his death left two widows A and B. G was the son of A and B had two daughters. After G's death his mother A succeeded to his property, B, having died only a day after G. The next presumptive reversioner of the estate namely N brought a suit against the widow for an injunction from committing waste. He based his claim on the footing that the widow A took the property as an heir to her son and that N was the next presumptive reversioner. The widow denied this and set up an independent title as a devisee under her husband's will whereby she was to take the property for her life and after her death the daughters of B were to take the property absolutely. Thus her claim denied the existence of any outstanding reversion. The suit on the advice of certain friends was compromised. Under the compromise, the half of the property in possession of the widow was given to her for her life and thereafter to B's daughters absolutely. The other half went to N and his sons :

Venkataramana Rao J. — Two questions which are of some importance were raised in this appeal. The one is whether the word "sister" in Act 2 of 1929, includes a half-sister ; and the other relates to the validity and binding nature of an arrangement embodied in a compromise decree in a litigation between the mother of a last male owner and the next presumptive reversioner concerning his estate. The relevant facts are not in dispute. One Muthukaruppa Muthiriyan died in 1921 possessed of property both moveable and immovable and leaving him surviving his two wives Chinnammal and Ammachi Ammal and a son Ganesa Muthiriyan by the said Chinnammal and two daughters, the plaintiffs in this suit, by Ammachi Ammal. Ganesa Muthiriyan died on 11th October 1924 unmarried and Ammachi Ammal died on 12th October 1924. Muthukaruppa Muthiriyan's property thus came into the sole possession of Chinnammal. The next presumptive reversioner to the estate of Ganesa Muthiriyan was his paternal uncle, that is his father's brother Neelamega Muthiriyan, defendant 2 in this suit. On 10th March 1926 Neelamega Muthiriyan filed a suit, O. S. No. 85 of 1926 on the file of the Court of the District Munsif of Srirangam against Chinnammal and others for an injunction restraining Chinnammal and her brother from committing waste of the property in her possession and for appointment of a Receiver in respect thereof. His claim was on the footing that Chinnammal inherited the said property as heir to her son Ganesa Muthiriyan and he was the presumptive reversioner to the estate. Chinnammal in her written statement denied that she took the property as her son's heir. She set up an independent title as the devisee under her husband's will. She alleged that all the property which her husband died possessed of was his self-acquired property, that shortly before his death he made an oral will to the effect that in case his son Ganesa Muthiriyan should die before attaining majority both his wives should enjoy his property for their lives and thereafter his daughters the plaintiffs herein should take the property absolutely and that she was in possession and management of the property, in pursuance of the said will. Thus the claim set up was a denial of any subsisting estate of Ganesa Muthiriyan and any outstanding reversion.

After the trial had begun, and evidence had been partly taken, common friends appear to have intervened and brought about a settlement of the matters in dispute and the terms of the settlement were reduced to writing in a razinamah dated 22nd July 1927 and a decree was obtained thereon. The result of the settlement was that the property then available and in the possession of the widow except jewels was divided into two halves, one half to be enjoyed by Chinnammal for her life and thereafter by the plaintiffs absolutely and the other half by Neelamega Muthiriyan and his sons. The jewels in the possession of Chinnammal were declared to be her absolute property. The suit against the other defendants was withdrawn, each party bearing his respective costs. The above arrangement was given effect to and the parties entered into possession of their respective shares and have been in enjoyment thereof. Two years after this decree, the Hindu Law of Inheritance Amendment Act (Act 2 of 1929) was passed and came into force in February 1929 in and by which a sister would be entitled to succeed in preference to a paternal uncle and his descendants. Two years thereafter in January 1931 the present suit was instituted by the plaintiffs alleging that by virtue of the said Act they became the presumptive reversioners to the estate of Ganesa Muthiriyan, that the said compromise could not operate in any manner whatsoever as against their reversionary right (vide para. 11 of the plaint) and they therefore prayed for a declaration that the said decree could not operate as against them [vide relief (a) in the prayer of the plaint]. They impleaded as parties to the suit in addition to Chinnammal the said Neelamega Muthiriyan and his four sons who are respectively defendants 2 to 6 in the suit. They pleaded that the plaintiffs were not heirs under the Hindu law at all as administered in this presidency, that Act 2 of 1929 did not confer on them any right and that the arrangement embodied in the said decree was a bona fide family settlement binding on the reversioners to the estate of Ganesa Muthiriyan and in any event on the plaintiffs on whom benefits were conferred thereunder. The learned Subordinate Judge negatived all their pleas and gave a decree to the plaintiffs declaring that the said decree is not binding on them. It is against this decree that this appeal has been preferred by defendants 3 and 4. Defendant 2 died since the institution of the suit and his sons defendants 3 to 6 are on record as his representatives.

The questions which fall to be decided are (1) (a) whether the plaintiffs as half-sisters of Ganesa Muthiriyan were his heirs before the Act came into force and (b) whether the word "sister" in the said Act includes a half-sister; (2) whether the compromise of the said decree in O. S. No. 85 of 1926 is a family settlement and if so, is it binding on the plaintiffs. There is no direct decision in this presidency recognizing a half-sister as an heir to the estate of a person dying intestate though she is assumed to be so in 5 Mad 29[1] and 5 Mad 241.[2] In fact the claims of a sister were not recognized in provinces where the Mitakshara law prevails except in Bombay on the ground that she was not mentioned as an heir in the Mitakshara. Her claim was however ultimately recognized in Madras on the ground that she would be a Bhinna Gothra Sapinda and therefore a heritable bhandu the list of bandhus mentioned in Mitakshara having been considered to be only illustrative and not exhaustive : 8 M H C R 88,[3] 5 Mad 241,[2] and 18 Mad 168.[4] On the same principle, a half-sister would be a heritable bandhu though in the order of succession she would be postponed to a full-sister. The plaintiffs must therefore be held to be included in the list of heirs to the estate of Ganesa Muthiriyan even before the said Act came into force.

The next question is whether "sister" includes a half-sister in Act 2 of 1929. The word "sister" is a plain English word and according to the rule of law governing the construction of statutes it must receive its plain, ordinary and grammatical meaning. So interpreted, a sister is a "woman born of same parents as one-self." This meaning has to be adhered to unless it is repugnant to the context or it is in variance with the intention of the Legislature as apparent from the Act. It seems to us that this interpretation would carry out the intention of the Legislature and any other would frustrate it. If one looks at the surrounding circumstances attending the passing of the Act and the cause and the necessity of it, as it is legitimate to do, if there is any doubt, the matter is put beyond doubt. Before the Act many near relations of a person dying intestate did not inherit to him at all in certain provinces and in others were postponed to distant relations remotely connected with him by ties of blood. It was felt that

1. Kumaravelu v. Viranna Goundan, (1882) 5 Mad 29.
2. Lakshmanammal v. Tiruvengada, (1882) 5 Mad 241.
3. Kutti Ammal v. Radhakrishna Aiyan, (1876) 8 M H C R 88.
4. Balamma v. Pullaya, (1895) 18 Mad 168=5 M L J 22.

his obvious injustice should be remedied by an alteration in the law and the Legislature did so in regard to certain specified relations. The Preamble of the Act shows what its object is, viz. "to alter the order in which certain heirs . . . . . are entitled to succeed." The word "certain" means definite or particular. What is meant by the expression "certain heirs" is specified heirs. In Cl. 2, four heirs who fulfil a particular description are specified. It is the order which was fixed for them in the then state of the law that was intended to be altered. Cl. 2 says that the heirs therein mentioned shall in the order so specified be entitled to rank in the order of succession next after a father's father. In provinces where the sister and the half-sister are recognized as heirs under the Mitakshara law, the order that is assigned to the half-sister is after the sister and not on a level with the sister. She has thus a distinct and separate order.

The order that is sought to be displaced is only in the case of a sister and not in the case of a half sister. This is consistent with the object of the Act which has for it the principle of propinquity of blood. Before the Act, in Madras, a sister's son would exclude the sister though she is more closely related to him by ties of blood, the reason being that under the Mitakshara the male bandhu excludes the female. But this principle was deliberately superseded by the Act in favour of the principle of affinity and hence a sister had been preferred to a sister's son. If therefore a sister were to include a half-sister she would exclude a sister's son, an interpretation which would defeat the intention of the Legislature. In 55 All 725,[5] the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court has taken the view that a sister would not include a half sister. This decision has been followed in 11 Luck 148.[6] Mulla in his Book on Hindu Law, Edn. 8, also states that a half sister not being mentioned in the Act will retain the place hitherto assigned to her as an heir in the presidencies where her right of heirship is recognized. We think this is the correct view and therefore hold that 'sister' does not include a half sister in Act 2 of 1929 and the plaintiffs are not therefore the presumptive reversioners to the estate of Ganesa Muthiriyan.

The next question is whether the compromise decree is binding on the plaintiffs. It is sought to be supported on the ground that it is a bona fide family settlement. It cannot be doubted that it is competent to a Hindu female holding a limited interest in the estate she holds as the heir of the last male owner to enter into a family settlement with the reversioners to the estate. Courts in India and the Privy Council have applied the principles of English law relating to family settlements to such settlements. In doing so, Courts have always regard to the nature of the interest possessed by such a limited owner and the reversioners to the estate and the limitations on their power recognized by the law to which they are subject. A Hindu widow is the owner of the estate which she inherits for the time being and fully represents it whether in litigation or otherwise. The interest of a reversioner is only a spes successionis and it cannot be made the subject-matter of any bargain. The arrangement entered into by the widow with the reversioners must not be a device to divide the estate between her and the reversioners to defraud the actual reversioners when the succession opens. Subject to these limitations, a family settlement bona fide entered into by a Hindu widow will be valid and binding on the reversion. The question of bona fides is to be considered with reference to the date when the transaction was entered into. When therefore Chinnammal compromised the said litigation, O. S. No. 85 of 1926, what were the circumstances and the state of affairs of the family? The property to which the claims were advanced by the respective parties were made the subject-matter of the litigation. The result of the litigation, if the contentions of the parties are upheld would be this: If Chinnammal succeeds, there is no estate of Ganesa Muthiriyan and no question of reversion to his estate; neither defendant 2 nor his sons and grandsons nor anybody can succeed at any time as heirs to his estate. If the contentions of defendant 2 were to prevail the plaintiffs will lose their rights as remaindermen with absolute rights under the alleged will of Muthukaruppa Muthiriyan and they will be relegated to the position of distant heritable bandhus
